

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE History of Tamíl Literature

With a Foreword by Dr. K. R. SRINIVASA IYENGAR

M. ARUNACHALAM

GANDHI VIDYALAYAM
TIRUCHITRAMBALAM
1974

First Edition

© M. ARUNACHALAM

GANDHI VIDYALAYAM

Tiruchitrambalam

Tanjavur District - S India

JEMINI PRINTING HOUSE KUMBAKONAM.

FOREWORD

For one like me whose acquaintance with Tamil literature is casual and superficial, it is an embarrassment to be asked to write a Foreword to a History of Tamil Literature by so distinguished and dedicated a scholar as Mr M Arunachalam. He has to his credit collections of essays and books of Saiva exegesis, and in particular his work in progress – the many-spanned History of Tamil Literature, of which several volumes have come out already – would be hailed, when completed, as one of the truly monumental achievements of scholarship in our time. But if I cannot speak as an expert, I can at least record my appreciation as a “common reader” (in the Johnsonian sense), who feels deeply beholden to Mr Arunachalam for these controlled views of the immense panorama of Tamil literature for the benefit of the English reader.

Who can say how in the dark night of pre-history, first speech, then poetry, marked the two decisive stages in the evolution of Homo Sapiens ?

*The Tree of Heaven, it's said, grows upside down, roots above, and fruit
below.*

Can it be that these seeming gusts of chance had their sanction from Above ?

Poetry was the language of wonderment, of varied and wild surmise ; it became the coin of sensibility , it was the community's memory, its store of aspiration and achievement , it was the ineluctable link between the generations, and the projection of hope and future possibility. And poetry was often allied to music and dance in the communal life of the people But although poetry at first came as naturally as leaves sprouting on a tree, means were found to treasure poetry and transmit the best of it to posterity. In course of time, as one reviewed the poetry of a long stretch of years, some sort of pattern too seemed to reveal itself

But one may ask, What is a ' literary history ' for ? Indeed, what is ' history ' for ? And what is ' history ' ?

On a superficial view, ' history ' is a record of the past, an objective record , but even this is not easy to accomplish We do not know all the facts. Surviving documentary, epigraphic and other evidence is a help, but the evidence is terribly incomplete Private unrecorded conversations may have determined many a decisive event, but of this we are wholly ignorant. Autobiographical memoirs may be loaded with self-glorification, prejudice, suppressio veri and suggestio falsi, and it is difficult to sift truth from half-truth and falsehood Social history is rather more significant than political history, but being in the nature of an "underground river" (G. M Trevelyan's phrase), the sinuous course of social history defies accurate description As for literary and cultural history, it is like catching the perfume in the air, the light dancing on the waters, or the music of the breeze playing on the leaves,

And isn't 'history' something more than an objective record of the 'past' – in politics and economics, in social and cultural life? Isn't 'history' verily a study of the unfolding of a progressive manifestation? If we believe that a nation is not just a jumble of recalcitrant individuals, but has its own evolving personality, its dialectic of becoming, then surely the history of a people, the history of a nation's literature, becomes invested with an inner law of evolutionary causation, a spinal cord of spiritual continuity, and to miss this inner truth might be to miss the whole essence and direction of the study.

It is usual to complain that 'scientific history' hasn't been cultivated in India, except in very recent times. We are not strong on 'facts' and 'figures'. Mythology and hagiology have liberally spread their parasitic overgrowths on 'history' and 'biography'. An excessive preoccupation with the eternities has encouraged perhaps the minimization of the realities of transient terrestrial experience. On the other hand, the fact that so much of the culture and literature of the distant past should have been so carefully preserved for us reveals on the part of our ancestors a far-sighted and prudential management beyond all praise.

The traditional history of the three 'Sanghams' may raise difficulties as regards their literal acceptance. But certainly their sequence is a historical pointer. Agastya was clearly the forerunner, Tolkappiyar the great spokesman and codifier, while Nakkirar and his compeers belong to the centuries immediately before and after Christ.

Tolkappiyam itself, with which Histories of Tamil Literature begin, must have been preceded by ages of vigorous literary activity. But Tolkappiyam is much more than a treatise on orthography, etymology and semantics, it is actually a unique compendium of ancient Tamil life and culture, laying due stress on aram-porul-inbam-vidu or dharmarthakamamoksha, and giving an integral view of the Tamil ethos of those times. Tolkappiyam and the two Sangham Collections - Ettut-tohai and Pattup-pattu the Eight Anthologies and the Ten Songs - to which the great Kural too should be added, constitute a body of verse that fuses the formal and the functional, subjective and objective, romantic and heroic, secular and religious, ethical and spiritual, into a glory of poetic recordation unparalleled elsewhere.

Tolkappiyam and Kural have of course their obvious and compelling unity in variety, but the tropical magnificence of the Ten Songs and the Eight Anthologies is a different matter. It is an assembly of almost 2400 individual poems, out of which over three-fourths are love poems. These latter are receiving increasing attention of late and although apparently stylized, and moving only within circumscribed limits, the poets seem to be able to ring an endless variety of change in intensity, mood and felicitous expression. The fivefold scenic differentiation - hill, jungle, field, seaside and wasteland - has an archetypal quality, and it is astonishing that without a surplusage of sensuality or eroticism running riot, these poems should nevertheless be able to cover the entire gamut of romantic love. For all their old-world bardic quality and popular flavour, the poems have still a contemporaneous ring, for one has only to substitute the traditional scenic backgrounds by modern prototypes like automobile, hotel, motel, Marina or railway platform, and absence on account of war by study or employment abroad, and the rival charmer by present day Hollywood variations like the steno or receptionist at the office. Only, modern poetry lacks that old taut intensity, that steely strength of phrasing, that sharp brevity and bite

But love could also mean Divine Love or Parama-Prema, God-intoxication and God-realization, and the Divine was sought in divers sacred spots, as in Tiru Murukatrappadar, that superb poetic formulation of the dynamic of aspiration, quest and ultimate fulfilment. It is a distinctive mark of the poetry of the Sangham Age that man, Nature and God-feeling, thought and action – the inner, outer and transcendent realms – all mingle and merge in a total harmony. No “dissociation of sensibility” here!

The main trends and the major figures of the post-Sangham Ages are a part of common knowledge. The twin epics, Silappadhikaram and Manimekhalai, the monsoon spate of Bhakti poetry unleashed by Tirumoolar, the Nayanmars and the Alvares, Saiva Siddhanta literature spearheaded by Meykandar, Arulnandi and Umapati, and Vaishnava literature by Vedanta Desika and Manavala Mamuni, the Jaina-Buddhist interregnum, Kamban, a host in himself, and the lesser epic poets, the coming of the Crescent and the Cross, and the emergence of the Islamic and the Christian poets; the new awakening, Tayumanavar, Arumukha Navalar and Ramalinga swami; the twentieth century, Subramania Bharati and after – it is like a perennial river flowing with many a winding bout, overcoming obstructions on the way, waxing wider and wider with deeps and shallows alternating or co-existing, and still flowing on and on, still receiving the freshes from the distant mountain-origins and also the tributaries all along the way, a splendid life-giver, and luminous with the Sun's rays. One is free to drink deep or but taste selectively from the perennial springs. New forms – short story, novel, social play, satire, free verse, essay, critique, radio talk – have come into currency to make the modern literary scene one of varied and almost exasperating complexity. But if one takes a synoptic view, one may perhaps see the soul of the old poetry inhabiting the new forms, for modern literature uncertainly oscillates between aham and puram, the good old wine is served up again albeit in novel containers, and the Lyra Mystica of an earlier age finds reincarnation in the work of, say, Sri Muruganar of Ramanashram. Tamil literature is thus still adventurously evolving and fulfilling itself.

Even when one is quite sure of the dates of authors and of their writings, a strictly chronological literary history has its limitations. One may concentrate on a few outstanding authors or classics, but that would be at the expense of wide comprehension. One may attempt a genre-wise, subject-wise, group-wise, facet-wise division, and graft chronology too within reason. Mr. Arunachalam has followed this strategy, which is all the more appropriate because the present work is only an 'Introduction' to the History of Tamil Literature. The survey is accordingly divided into forty-seven chapters averaging seven pages each, and the chapter headings have a telltale ring. The aim is analytical inclusiveness, but also avoidance of crushing detail and bewildering complexity. After the admirable opening chapters on 'The Land and the People' and 'The Language and the Literature', one is not obliged to follow strictly the order of the chapters, one is free to read what immediately attracts, to move forward and backward, till the whole fascinating ground has been covered at last. Most of the individual chapters have their own unity and sufficiency, whether they are about particular authors, works, or about a group of poems or class of writing. Altogether the narrative exudes an impression of speed, amplitude, variety and significant detail. By resolved limitation, Mr Arunachalam hasn't given illustrative quotations except in the chapter on Kamban (where he has wisely drawn upon Justice Maharajan's sensitive English rendering), and in a few other contexts. While this detracts somewhat from the usefulness of the 'History' to non-Tamil readers, it has made for compactness. There are also chapters on the Lexicons, Ballads and Folk-Songs, Tamil Script, and Inscriptions. The Modern Period is merely glanced at towards the close of the book, and in fact Mr. Arunachalam isn't quite at home with the newest fashions in writing. On total view, however, Mr. Arunachalam's book is just what it claims to be. it is an introduction to a great subject, it is broad-based, it is very readable, it is informative and instructive, and above all it is a labour of love and devotion to the cause of Tamil Letters

Mylapore, Madras
14th March 1974

K. R. SRINIVASA IYENGAR

PREFACE

Tamil and Sanskrit, the most ancient languages of India, are as rich as any other ancient language in the world. But the glory of Tamil is that unlike the other classical languages, which have ceased to be the common speech of the people, Tamil continues to be one. It is the mother tongue of forty millions of people in Tamilnad, and also of a considerable section of the people living in Ceylon, Malaysia, Singapore, Fiji, South Africa and Burma. There is quite a large number of the Tamil-speaking people in India itself, outside the Tamil area. The language embodies an ancient and varied literature and a literary tradition, whose origin is lost in the mists of pre-history. Among what is known as the Dravidian group of languages, Tamil is recognized today as the earliest to cultivate a great literature and a noble culture. It is gratifying that it is receiving in the latter half of the twentieth century an increasing recognition among the linguistic scholars of the world.

This book is in the nature of a short introduction to the history of that literature and is intended to acquaint the eager English reader with the wide range of Tamil literature over a period of more than twenty centuries. It does not profess to give an exhaustive historical treatment of material, but it does endeavour to give an objective bird's-eye view of the range and variety of Tamil literature, and a brief account of the growth of each genre.

This work is really an offshoot of my larger encyclopaedic history of Tamil literature, of which seven volumes in Tamil covering six centuries (the 10th to the 15th) have already been published and further volumes are going through the press. The detailed historical survey of the entire range of Tamil literature which I made in preparing those volumes has given me a total perspective which has controlled the selection of material given in this work. The primary concern of this work is, not with dates, but with the structure of works and their several trends and the conspectus of literary events. I have endeavoured to survey each branch of literature from the beginning to the modern day, utilizing political history (including epigraphic records), cultural phenomena, metrical growth, linguistic peculiarities and thought development. Naturally the chapter headings do not follow any chronological order. Illustrative translations have not generally been attempted. Avoidable controversial matter has been avoided. Authors belonging to different faiths have contributed to Tamil literature and, if their works are criticized, it is purely from the literary point of view, and not from the religious.

Some earlier books in English on the history of Tamil literature deserve mention in this preface. Simon Casie Chitty's Tamil Plutarch (1859 Jaffna) has given a short and interesting account of the lives of 193 men of letters in the Tamil language arranged in an alphabetical order; it is far from being scientific or historical. M. S. Purnalingam pillai was the earliest to attempt a real history but historical material available in his days (1929) was scant and his achievement, though amazing, has become obsolete since, it is yet valuable for the amount of information it gives. Rao Sahib Vaiyapuri pillai's book (1956) is weighted down heavily with a discussion of dates; though most original and scientific in approach, it suffers from the writer's studied attempt to discover a non-Tamil source for everything Tamil; it deals only with the first ten centuries after Christ and is therefore incomplete. The book by the Jesudasans (1961) is more satisfactory, but it suffers from a lack of charitableness of judgement and empathetic perception in matters relating to the great religious experiences of the Tamils. T. P. Minakshisundaranar's book (1965) is an advance on all its predecessors; but its scope is limited by the exclusion from its purview of grammatical and religious writing, and by the nature of the foreign readers to whom it was mainly intended. J. M. Somasundaram Pillai had planned to write a large history in four volumes. He published only the first volume, reaching upto 600 A.D., in 1967. He has devoted greater attention to the translation of poetic pieces than to the discussion of historical trends.

A few words on the books written in the Tamil language¹ may not be out of place here. K. S. Srinivasa

1 Many books have recently been written with the title 'History of Tamil Literature', but they are all in the nature of 'notes' on prescribed textbooks, being based only on the syllabus in Tamil prescribed for the degree courses in the Universities, here all authors and all works receive only perfunctory treatment and no one of these writers had obviously set out to write a history at all.

Pillai of Tanjavur, wrote and published his Tamil Varalaru volume I and part I of volume II in 1927¹. He employed the scientific historical method but the published parts stop short at 1000 A D. For original literary criticism, accuracy and proper marshalling of historical material, insight into the times, catholicity of taste and width of treatment, there is no book to equal his. But the source material available in his day was not much and yet his book remains even today a marvel of original writing. Other books on the subject in the Tamil language are wholly unsatisfactory. K. Subramanya Pillai (1930) wrote mostly from memory and his history suffers from several inadequacies. The short book by V. Selvanayakam of Ceylon (1951) is a good book in that it has an original approach to the epochs of Tamil literary history. It divides the history into six periods – the Sangham, the post-Sangham, the Pallava, the Chola, the Nayak and the European periods. This is a political classification which cannot but result in a great amount of over-lapping and cannot obviously give a correct perspective of literary trends. Some books have been published

1 Pillai was a giant both in his pleader's profession and in the field of Tamil literary criticism and was a terror in both, because of his sharp tongue, he was a man who could not suffer fools. He had written up the second part of Volume II completing the History, a thief broke into his house one night and carried away the cash box in which he had kept this manuscript also. Not knowing its value, the thief would of course have thrown it away. The author had no more patience to re-write it and he passed away leaving the published parts incomplete.

by the Annamalai University but they are neither comprehensive nor scientific, only the one on Tolkappiyam appears satisfactory

Upto the dawn of the twentieth century, literature in Tamilnad was mostly in the shape of poetry. In a broader sense, poetry is the liveliest expression of the personality of a nation. The Tamil peoples, even in the remote past of more than 2500 years ago, had a living faith in God, in the light of which they tackled life's variegated problems. Some critics lament the fact that our poets have not sung any poem on Nature-in-itself but then they overlook the fact that Nature is only a backdrop to the human drama and all that man can sing of Nature can only be subjective. Poetry in the remote past had only one aim – to reflect life as it was and as it should be. To the Tamilian, art has a higher purpose – not only to give joy to life but also to ennoble and elevate it. Every ruling prince in the ancient Tamilnad had a floral emblem. The correlation of different love moods in poetry to the five physiographical regions and the celebration of even martial acts with floral symbols argues an uncommon attunement of Tamil society with nature. The intimate treatment of nature found in Sangham poetry is unparalleled in the whole range of world literature.

The discerning reader will find many unfamiliar byways of literature explored in this book. Many subjects, which have not received the attention of literary historians, have been given detailed consideration here As illustrations, we may mention the sections on Isai and Natakam, Vira Saiva and Vedanta writing, the Puranas, the Siddhas and the Ballads and Folk-songs The section on Other writing is on a subject which has never been thought worthy of consideration by scholars till now The sections on Inscriptions and Script have a definite place in any account of language or literature, although both of them have never been so much as mentioned in the historical treatises till now.

This book deals with the different aspects of Tamil literature upto the opening of this century only. New genres have sprung into being in the twentieth century but they have not been taken up for consideration here

Sometimes the same subject may be found treated in two or more places, under different subject groups, for example, mention of Andal is made in the section on the Vaisnava canon, and again in the sections on Minor poems-II and on Women poets Some overlapping is unavoidable, because of the pattern of treatment adopted

Commentators of a thousand years ago had dwelt at length on the existence of two earlier Tamil academies in two capital cities of the Pandiyas situated in a stretch of land south of Cape Comorin and now submerged by the sea However, there seems to be a school of thought now which holds the existence of the academies to be a myth, because some geologists do not concede that any land existed south of Cape Comorin We should remember that geology is a developing science and the scientists have not pronounced the last word on the subject yet. A long stretch of land is also said to have existed connecting Madagascar with our west coast and going on east upto the Malayan archipelago. I have just quoted in this book the prevalent opinion about the academies. Even allowing for exaggeration on the part of the commentators, there is no reason to dismiss their entire account as mere myth and a product of the imagination. Adiyarkku-nallar mentions seven groups of seven territories¹ and says that these as well as many hill tracts such as Kumari and Kollam, forest, river and city upto the northern Kumari peak, were swallowed up by the sea. This is not the place to examine the correctness of those remarks but I would content myself with stating that all this could not be the invention of any brain however fertile, and then there was no purpose in making such an invention.

Tamil Literature covers a period of more than twenty centuries and its history witnesses for the most part a continuous evolution of the literature, in grammar, in expression, in forms and in thought content. The Tamil people, like every other people in the world, have experienced many upheavals, revolutions and wars. Many invasions, infiltrations and dominations have occurred, but these have been less in the Tamil country than in the north of India, because Tamilnad is a peninsular area, insulated by the sea on three sides and foreign marauders who came by land could hardly penetrate far enough into the south. Yet, it is a marvel that it has preserved unbroken a tradition covering many millennia, the surprising thing is that the literature of two thousand years ago can still be read and enjoyed by the Tamils of today and can still remain a source of inspiration to them

1 The seven Tenga nadu, Madurai nadu, Munpalai nadu, Pimpalai nadu, Kunra nadu, Kunakarai nadu and Kurumpanai nadu.

The age of many great authors is yet a vexing question, but I have ventured to fix the dates with, I hope, a fair degree of accuracy. Those dates can be found in the centurywise chronological table of books and authors appended to this work

A note on the scheme of transliteration and a glossary of the Tamil and Sanskrit terms used in this book have been added. It is hoped that acquaintance with this glossary will be helpful to the lay reader

I am thankful to Justice S. Maharajan for permission to include in this book a lengthy extract from his admirable monograph on Kamban and to Mr R. Nagaswami for his help in revising the section on the Tamil script. Dr. K. R. Srinivasa Iyengar has enriched the book with an illuminating foreword. Words are inadequate to express my thanks to him

Tiruchitrambalam
Tamil New Year's Day
Ananda-Chitrai-1

M ARUNACHALAM

CONTENTS

	Page
Foreword	v
Preface	xiii
1 The Land and its people	3
2 The Tamil Language and its Literature	10
3 The Tamil Sangham	16
4 Mut-Tamil	21
5 Iyal-Tamil – Tamil Grammar	25
6 Tolkappiyam	29
7 Tamil Rhetoric	34
8 The Lexicons	36
9 Tamil Isai	39
10 Dance and Drama	46
11 Poetry of the Sangham Period – I Ettuttohāi	55
12. Poetry of the Sangham Period – II Pattuppattu	66
13 Tirukkural	73
14 The Twin Epics Silappadhikaram and Manimekhalai	83
15 The Eighteen Kilik-kanakku	92
16 Epic Literature	97
17 The Jaina Epics	106
18 Kamba Ramayanam	114
19 The Saiva Canon – I	126
20 The Saiva Canon – II	142
21 The Vaishnava Canon – I	148
22 The Vaishnava Canon – II	159
23 The Itihasas	168
24 Ethical Literature	173
25 Devotional Poetry	184
26 The Commentaries	194
27 Saiva Literature	202

	Page
28 Vaishnava Literature	212
29 Vedanta Writing	217
30 Vira Saiva Writing	222
31 Jaina Literature	225
32 Buddhist Writing	230
33 The Puranas	232
34 Minor poems – I	238
35 Minor Poems – II	251
36 Anthologies	256
37 The Siddhas	261
38 Ballads and Folk-songs	265
39 Other Writing	273
40 Christian Writers	276
41 Muslim Writers	281
42 The Poets	284
43 Women Poets	289
44 Tamil Prose	294
45 Tamil Script	304
46 Inscriptions	312
47 The Modern Period	322

APPENDICES

1 Notes	330
2 Scheme of Transliteration	334
3 Glossary	336
4 Chronology of the Literature	341
5. Bibliography	347
Index	348
Errata	364

AN INTRODUCTION TO
THE HISTORY OF TAMIL LITERATURE

THE LAND AND ITS PEOPLE

THE LAND

The southern part of India is known from the very ancient days as the Tamil land. Its limits from historical times are Vēṅkatam (modern Tiruppatī) in the north, Cape Comorin in the south¹ and the present Bay of Bengal and the Arabian Sea in the east and the west respectively. Tamilian literary tradition says that there was a wide stretch of land south of Cape Comorin where Pāṇḍiyan cities flourished, many hills and rivers existed and many divisions of territories also existed, and that the language was in a highly cultivated state. All this is said to have been deluged by the sea in times long past. Even in the present day, the restricted territorial limit no longer applies. Vēṅkatam in the north has gone to the Andhra, and the west coast has gone to the Kerala states. But it has to be admitted that these were the boundaries before the evolution of the other branches of the Dravidian group into independent languages.

Views have been expressed by eminent western scholars to the effect that the South of India would have been the cradle of the human race and that the peninsular India is today substantially as it existed before the beginnings of life. The present inhabitants of Tamilnad, the Tamilians, are considered by most to be indigenous to the soil, they had not migrated to this land from any other area.

It is but natural that persons with linguistic or racial bias seek to belittle such claims made in literary legends. It should be remembered that those who penned down these legends had no particular desire to assign their people or culture a remote past. Modern prejudices did not exist then, and the ancient writers merely noted down for posterity, what they had heard and known, and what they feared would be forgotten and would pass into oblivion. The commentary of Adiyarkku nallar on *Silappadhikāram*² shows us his great earnestness and sincerity in handing down knowledge and history, tradition and culture to posterity, we also see how sad he was feeling that a great heritage and a great many cultural institutions had died and gone into disuse in his day. We see therefore no reason to think that writers such as he were weaving mere fantastic stories to glorify the land and its people. The neo-modern criticism in this regard is therefore unwarranted when it questions the veracity of their statements.

We do not wish to enter into any controversy here regarding the Dravidians and the Aryans. We would simply state here that even at the time of the earliest recorded history of the land and its literature, the two groups had intermingled to form the group which we now call the Tamilian.

We learn that from the very early days the country was divided into three territorial units—the Sēras in the west, the Pāndiyas in the south, and the Chōlas in the east and the north, ruled by these princes. They had their capital cities at Vanji, Madurai and Puhār respectively. This division existed till about the 3rd century A D , when a new dynasty named the Pallavas came up in the north, with Kāncī as its capital The Pallava area was known as the Tondainād and gradually it expanded towards the south, very soon completely over-running the Chōla territory

Though we have many legends connected with the ruling houses of Tamiḷnad, we have no connected history Karikāla of the Chōla dynasty was the most famous monarch and his memory is now cherished by posterity by the many irrigation systems he inaugurated Nedunceliyan of the Pāndiya dynasty and Senkuttuvan of the Sēras are equally famous figures All of them were great patrons of art and letters and they freely gave to bards and singers One ruler is said to have fed the warring forces in the Mahābhārata war³ Many had performed vedic sacrifices.⁴ No king is spoken of as a tyrant, all were benevolent rulers who held justice and the good of all as their goals in life The ancient kings seem to have practised monogamy Petty chiefs had sway over small domains and they also vied with one another in helping the people, particularly bards and artistes Valour in battle and chivalry were equally considered as virtues by all classes of the people

The rivers Kāvēri of the Chōlas and the Vaigai and the Porunai of the Pāndiyas had acquired great literary and cultural fame All the three states together constituted the Tamiḷnad and had considerable overseas trade Puhār or Kāvērippattinam (Chōla), Korkai and Tondi (Pāndiya), and Musiri (Sēra) were the important sea ports of the respective areas Trade was carried on with Greece, Rome,

Egypt and Arabia in the west, and China and the Eastern Archipelago in the east. The princes had a large maritime fleet and these, in the days of the later Chōla monarchs, helped to conquer other territories and spread there Tamilian culture and civilization, and the Tamilian religion and way of life.

The Tamilian civilization had been, as it has been everywhere in the world, a river-based civilization. Tradition and geography credit the land with many rivers such as the Pālāru, Pennāru, Kāvērī, Vaigai and Porunai in the east, and the Periyāru on the west coast. Though all the rivers exist, it is only the Kāvērī that has been 'feeding its children with its thousand arms' (meaning the scores of irrigation channels which had been laid out in the course of the last two thousand years). The Kāvērī is the Ponnī, the Golden Lady, celebrated in legend and song as the giver of all wealth to her people through agriculture.

The land has specific monsoon periods which help in the flow of water along its rivers for irrigation, and a good amount of fertility has been maintained in the soil for many scores of centuries.

THE PEOPLE

Monarchy was the form of government. The kings had their own separate flags and court bards, and maintained the fourfold armies. There were frequent wars among the kings but the highest moral code was practised in battles and in warfare. Even in wars, the fighting forces never harmed cattle, women, the enlightened persons, the sick, children and similiar others. Mechanical engineering contrivances also helped in warfare.

Valour and honour were considered more precious than the very life. The rulers were invariably the upholders of honour and justice. A regular tax was paid to the king for the benefit of his administration.

The Pāndiyan pearls were famous throughout the world. Tamilian textiles were the most coveted articles of merchandise in the west. Metal coins were in use, the insignia of the princes was stamped on them. Customs levies were made on the incoming articles. Fairness was the keynote in all the people's transactions, such as trade.

There was survey of land. The sciences of mathematics and astronomy were in a very developed state. Medicine was a specialised science. Architecture also seems to have been well advanced. Drainage schemes were in vogue in large cities.

The family was the unit of all social life and so progeny was held to be vital to one's own salvation. The birth of a son in the family was a great event. Women had equal rights with men. Chivalry was the rule and women were held in great esteem, they were not treated as chattels, as in the degenerate later day society.

Marriage was considered a solemn union which nothing could break. A happy householder's life was the ideal. Though polygamy existed, monogamy was the rule. Chastity was considered the noblest of a woman's virtues. Women excelled in music and dance, which were at the peak of their glory then. Light games like balls were set apart for women, while men took part in serious games, sometimes dangerous also,

Mechanical swimming pools, public parks and the like were there for recreation, for men as well as women. Families took part in important monthly festivities of a social as well as a religious nature.

In the matter of dress, silk and wool were also in use besides cotton. Gold and gems were in use for ornaments. Mud pots and brass vessels were used in the house.

It was the duty of the parent to bring up his child as a noble citizen. Learning was greatly respected. Education was in a well advanced state, the teacher had the greatest esteem in society. Elders were always respected.

Though castes existed, they were not rigid. In arts and letters, in love of God, in the capacity for action, and in affording opportunities for worldly advancement through one's own effort, caste was no bar.

Drink and gambling existed in all ranks of society but both were considered vices and there was a regular campaign against their practice.

Friendship and loyalty to friends were held to be great virtues. Truthfulness, a sense of gratitude and respect to elders were greatly cultivated. Agriculture was the main stay of the people. Manual labour was considered important and the spirit of the dictum 'work is worship' ruled the society then. Righteousness, fear of God and service to fellow beings were the most cherished virtues. The sense of patriotism was high, although it was territorially very limited.

Religious observances and festivals were important parts of the people's lives. Festivities were always accompanied by music and dance. Feeding the poor and the needy was considered the greatest of virtues. The religious rituals were well organised. Great reverence was shown to the brahmin. People believed in a Higher Power which governed their destinies and believed in karmā. We meet with the worship of Viṣṇu, Muruga, Śiva and Śakti very often, but mention of the Jina or the Buddha is absent.

References

- 1 Preface to Tolkappiyam by Panamparanar
- 2 Sīlappadhikaram, Chapter 8, Venir-kathai Adiyarkku nallar's commentary on lines 1-2
- 3 Purananuru, verse 2
- 4 Pandiyan palyagasalai mudukudumi-p-Peruvaludi, Rajasuyam vetta Peru narkilli, Karikala and Nalankilli verses 15, 16, 224, 400 of Purananuru

THE TAMIL LANGUAGE AND ITS LITERATURE

THE LANGUAGE

The earliest book on the Tamil language and literature is considered to be Tolkāppiyam. Ignoring many fantastic claims for its date as some thousand years before Christ, we may be factually correct if we assume that its date was somewhere between 500 B C. and 1 B C. That Tolkāppiyar postulates many linguistic theories and discusses at length the subject matter of poetry, poetics, rhetoric and the like and says that the thoughts were expressed by earlier grammarians,¹ signifies that the language and its literature were in a greatly developed state long before him. The only language which can claim to have a very ancient past, as ancient as that claimed for Sanskrit, is Tamil. All the north Indian languages of today branched off from Prākṛit, the spoken form of Sanskrit, much later in point of time. The three main South Indian languages, Telugu, Kannada and Malayalam branched off probably from a parent stock long after Tamil, Malayalam branched off directly from Tamil, a thousand years ago. Local variations and the proportion of the admixture of Sanskrit are responsible for the variations in the languages.

Sanskrit influence has pervaded the Tamil country even in the days of Tolkāppiyam, in which also its influences are traceable.² The Tamil language possesses more effective vowels and a lesser number of consonants. The latter may perhaps be inadequate to express some aspirated and softer sounds as in Sanskrit, but they had proved quite adequate to express Tamil sounds and thoughts. The language of Tolkāppiyam and still earlier days had proved through the centuries adequate enough to express all the thoughts which the Tamilian thinker had the need to think and express. In short, the Tamil language had enough vitality, depth and width to stand on its own, along with any ancient living language of the world, with the power of expressing the most subtle thoughts of the human mind. Technology is something new to every language, and terms are invented in the stride of science. Such terms can also be absorbed and adapted in the Tamil language and also invented here as occasion demands.

A large admixture of Sanskrit words found its way into the spoken and the written language by the 11th century A. D. through the exponents of the Vaisnava philosophy, and later by those of the Jain school. Muslim invasions and the British domination had their own share in infiltrating foreign words and forms into the language. But Tamil has absorbed them all and still today marches ahead, without in any way losing any part of its native genius and vitality. The Tamil language is an agglutinative language, case endings for nouns and verbal inflexions for tense, place, gender and number are added on to the root, which remains almost the same. This is the secret of the language of the Kural and similar works written twenty centuries and fifteen centuries ago, being still easy of comprehension to the literate Tamilian. Syntax has not changed,

LITERATURE

The glory of Tamil as that of Sanskrit is that it has had an unbroken and continuous history of literary production for the last twenty centuries. Historians say that the brāhmī script was used for the earliest writing followed by what is known as the vatteluttu, which in time gave place to the modern script. The Vaisnava theologians wrote a style employing a majority of Sanskrit words, written in the grantha script of the Sanskrit language, it was called the manī-pravāla. The language was however not corrupted by such writing, which after a few centuries almost ceased to exist as a linguistic force.

Poetic form had been the expression of all literature in Tamil from the earliest times. All books were written in verse. Manuals of grammar, peculiar to only a few languages like Sanskrit and Tamil, were all written in verse. Not only that. Any matter that was worth-while was penned down in verse. Lexicons, medical books, astrological manuals, mathematical books, architectural treatises and many similar others were written down in verse.

The earliest types of verse were four³, but two of them somehow fell into disuse - the vanjippā and the kalippā; only the venbā and the āsuriyappā continue from the earliest period to this day. Many variations in the metre occurred of course over the centuries. Popular songs required still greater variations and the language was elastic enough to accommodate all such variations.

Early Tamil literature was classified as aham (pertaining to love themes) and puram (other themes) but such a classification gradually fell into disuse. The entire poetry of the Sangham age falls into this classification. But some centuries later, the two get dovetailed. Similarly also, the concept of the five natural regions kurinji, mullai, marutam, neidal and pālai, generally pertaining to the love themes of the earlier poetry, gets intermingled. We hear of mut-Tamil, dealing with literary Tamil, music and drama (yal, isai and nātakam but only the first category has been handed down to us in a continuous stream, isai had a chequered course through history, while drama seems to have been almost snubbed out, even at the very commencement of Tamil literary history. Grammar which originally dealt with orthography, etymology and topics of poetry, later on took on prosody and poetics, and rhetoric also, as separate branches.

The beginnings of Tamil literature were only in the form of stray and occasional verses, continuous or connected verses were rare. Ethical dictums were coined by many writers but they were all in the nature of only isolated verses. There are some long poems among them such as the various ārruppadais, which are narratives within a limited range, but here each is one single complete poem, not a string of verses. There have been group poems like the Kalittolai, but here also the group is not a continuous narrative, each verse in the group is an isolated verse. Silappadhikāram is the first continuous narrative poem, it is in the āṣṛiyam metre followed by two others in the same metre, which very soon gave place to the more elastic, moving and melodious viruttam metre.

The viruttam was a copy from the Śaiva and the Vaiṣṇava canon, where the metre was employed in strings of continuous verses often 10 or 11, constituting a poem in praise of a shrine. A large volume of ethical dictum was coined by many poets during the period between the Sangham poetry and the later epic poetry, in the venbā metre. All of them were in the nature of isolated verses in the venbā metre, which by now had to compete with the viruttam for popularity. Of course the viruttam won, because of its easy movement, harmony of sound, regular measured feet, and the mechanical aids of rhyme, alliteration and assonance, more specifically by its easy adaptability to singing. The viruttam was relatively freer than the venbā and more loose. The place secured by the viruttam during the days of the rise of the epic continues to be occupied by it to this day.

During this period, there was imperial rule in the land and royal patronage was available to many writers. When the imperial dynasties died out, continuous long narratives gave place to shorter minor poems of diverse character in praise of God or man. Men of letters turned their attention from original writing to the writing of glosses on grammatical treatises, on epic poetry, ethical works and so on. Then came philosophical literature—Śaiva, Vaiṣṇava, Vēdānta and occasionally Jaina also. By now many religious centres came to be established and these encouraged the writing of further canonical and expository writing in verse and prose.

Such was the general trend of the literary output at a time when the Muslims invaded the land.

Religious writing was intensified and we find crops of purāṇas in scores, and several new types of minor poems in hundreds, being written. The advent of the British rule introduced printing, and prose writing developed. Every thing was going on in a humdrum way till there came political awakening in the land. The struggle for independence started and ushered in an era of nationalistic poetry, with the result that Tamil has come into its own in the affairs of men.

References

- 1 Cf Seyyulīyal 1, 2, 38, 39, 41, 60 and many other sutras in this section and in several others
- 2 Cf Preface Reference to Aindra vyakarana, Solladhikaram, 9 5
- 3 Tolkappiyam, Poruladhikaram, Seyyulīyal 101

THE TAMIL SANGHAM

Sangham is a Sanskrit word meaning a gathering; here it is used in the sense of the gathering of Tamil men of letters - a learned assembly, an academy, or even what we now understand by the term university. We have any number of legends referring to three such academies, the first at a south Madurai and the second at Kapātapuram, both of them deluged by the sea in pre-historic times, and the third at the site of the present city of Madurai, the north Madurai. The commentator on *Iraiyānār Kalaviyal*¹ is the first writer to give an elaborate account of the three academies, Adiyārkkunallār repeats the same particulars in his commentary on *Silappadhikāram*². But the very word Sangham is not found in Tolkāppiyam, since it rules that the letter ca (the first letter in Sangham) cannot occur in the beginning of a word³.

Kapātapuram, the head-quarters of the second Sangham is mentioned by Vālmīki⁴ as the capital city of contemporary Pāndiyas. Muranjiyur Mudināgarāya, author of the second verse in the Puranānūru, is mentioned as a poet of the second Sangham⁵. But the poems of the Sangham age which we have today do not mention the sangham at all. The earliest reference to the sangham occurs in a song of Saint Appar,⁶ where he says that the Lord of Madurai appeared before the sangham in the guise of a poet and caused a purse of gold to be handed over to Dharmi; this refers to a legend connected with the second verse of the anthology Kuruntohai, which says that no flower's fragrance can equal that of a young maiden's tresses. The Cinnamanūr plates of Rājasimha Pāndiya mention the fact of the establishment of (ie, the patronage extended to) the Madurāpurī Tamil Sangham.⁷ Hence the existence of the Sangham was beyond doubt a historical fact.

Lord Śiva, the presiding deity of Madurai, in the person of a poet by name Irayanār,⁸ is said to have presided over the first Sangham. Agastya had been said to be a poet and master who presided over the deliberations of the second academy. He wrote a grammar on the three branches of Tamil, in his name Agattiyam, which was the guide for the first Sangham, of his twelve disciples, Tolkāppiyar wrote a grammar in his name which was the guide for the second Sangham, of the two, Agattiyam had ceased to exist even two thousand years ago, while Tolkāppiyam is today available in full. Irayanār kalaviyal mentions in great detail the number of poets in the three sanghams, the books produced by them, the number of the Pāndiya patrons, the number of years each academy existed, and so on.⁹ Although there is no means of verifying the particulars given therein, we have to concede the fact that such academies existed, even by the mere fact of the great development seen in the language, its literature, its poems and conventions, and the treatment and development of the subject matter of poetry even in the third Sangham, two thousand years ago. The Tamils, even through the well known period of the last twenty centuries, did not attach any importance to correct historical information. Factual truths were nothing to them when compared to the poetic and religious truths

Aḍiyārkkū nallār says that the epic Udayanan kathai, (Perum kathai) was a fine product, carefully worked out and finished by a deep study of the works of the second sangham,¹⁰ a critical study of this book bears out his statement and tells us that this book is beyond doubt the result of a careful study of the earlier texts and of the people also. Hence, ignoring the legendary exaggeration of ages and time, there is nothing improbable in accepting the statement that two academies had flourished for a large number of years under the patronage of the Pāṇḍiyas, long before the period of the Sangham poetry which is now available to us. The three academies might have been continuous, the distinction as three being necessitated probably by natural catastrophies such as a deluge.

The statements that Śiva and Kumāra participated in the deliberations of the first two sanghams and that these lasted for 4440 and 3700 years may be legend, but the very existence of the sanghams is not legend. The Kalabhra interregnum in Madurai between 250 and 550 A. D. had so completely obliterated all evidence of earlier academies and such well developed cultural and literary Tamil institutions and traditions,¹¹ that any statement made in the later centuries is taken as mere legend. Of course false legends had also gathered round true facts, such as the existence of a floating sangham seat on the golden lotus tank which would accept only the highest in poetry and push out the rest, and which in fact did push out all the other poets to give room to Kural, much to the chagrin of the ancient Sangham poets themselves

Writers had greatly emphasized an insignificant incident that one Vajranandi established a Jain Sangham at Madurai by the end of the 5th century A. D., and had sought to discredit the earlier Tamil Sangham itself. We have absolutely no reference to this Jain Sangham anywhere in Tamil Literature. It is quite possible that it was founded under the Kalabhras to offset the wholly indigenous and ancient influence of the Tamil Sanghams, but it has not achieved anything except to serve as a convenient handle to some scholars to confuse the issue.¹² We have to take the detailed, factual and legendary statements of Kalaviyal commentator and Adiyārkkunallār as statements calculated not only to give a factual history, but also to offset the interloping idea of a dramila sangham of the Jains at Madurai.

Notes and References

1. Iraiyānar kalaviyal edited by CR. Namasivaya Mudaliyar.
2. Silappadhikaram, chapter 8, Venir kathai, Adiyārkkunallar's commentary on lines 1-2
3. Tolkappiyam, Book I, chapter 2 62.
4. Valmiki Ramayana, Kishkinda kanda, chapter 41 verse 18
'Tato hemamayam divyam mukta manī vibhushitam, Yuktam kavatam Pandyanam gata drakshyatha vanarah' Govindaraja, the commentator interprets kavatam as the capital city of the Pandiyas.

5. Irāṇyanar kalavīyal, CR Namasivaya Mudaliyar's edition, Sutra 1, pages 8-9 Vide Adiyarkkunallar quoted above, Dr. Swaminatha Ayyar's edition of Silappadhikaram 1927, page 230.
6. Saint Appar, Devaram Book 3, verse 3 of Tirupputtur Tiru Tandakam.
7. Peruntohai by M Raghava Ayyangar 1936, verse 892 line 29.
- 8 The term Irāṇyanar means Lord God
- 9 Irāṇyanar kalavīyal pages 8-9 Vide also the table on page 283 in my History of Tamil Literature, 10th Century (Tamil)
- 10 Vide his preface to his commentary, page 8 of Swaminatha Ayyar's edition 1927
- 11 Vide T V Sadasiva Pandarattar, Pandiyar Varalaru (Tamil) 1966, page 35
12. Professor Vaiyapuri Pillai eloquently speaks of the dramila sangham without substantial evidence and says that Madurapuri Sangham of this inscription might well have been this one He has forgotten the fact that the Pandiyas who overthrew the Kalabhras were at that time ardent Saivas and anything Jain would have been anathema to them Besides, the Vajranandi sangham was a religious body and was not a literary academy

MUT – TAMIL

From very early times, Tamil literature has been considered to have had three divisions – Iyal, Isai and Nātakam. Iyal stands for the subject matter of all literary composition, Isai stands for music and musical composition, and Nātakam for dance and drama and dramatic composition. Agastya of the legendary first sangam is supposed to have written a treatise on the three divisions ¹. No work of his is available now and we are unable to extricate him from the realm of legend. But in later gloss-writing we find many references to mut-Tamil and extracts from mut-Tamil books. Hence the concept of mut-Tamil is real.

Iyal Tamil is all speech and writing, including poetry. In this sense all the Tamil literature that has come into existence from the pre-Christian era down to the present day is Iyal Tamil. Tolkāppiyar, who wrote the first available grammar for the language, dealt only with Iyal Tamil. He limited his writing to the three parts – orthography, etymology and the subject matter of literature, later writers had extended the last branch to two more parts – prosody and poetics, and rhetoric, grammar had since come to be known as having these five parts, the Aṇḍilakkaṇam. But no one of the stature of Tolkāppiyar had attempted all the five parts, although there were some very good books which dealt with individual parts. His book remains the best book on the three parts even to this day.

Silappadhikāram is hailed as the only ancient book which treats of mut-Tamil. Many chapters in the book having the title kuravar, var and mālar belong to the branch of music (isai). Besides, the author himself makes several references in his long poem to the many aspects of isai.² However, the tradition of this isai, which was perhaps in vogue at the time of the Agastya of the first sangam and even at the time of the last sangham, seems to have faded out later. Paripādal, a late work of the third sangham, mentions musical notations, instruments and composers for its verses. The term paripādal is one which was applied in those days to musical composition. Adiyārkkunallār deals very elaborately with music, composition, singing instruments and allied subjects, quoting extensively many passages from works of the past, and also regretfully mentioning the fact that most of them had been lost even in his day.³ Even the books which were available to him in the 12th century have unfortunately become extinct since then.

Still greater is the contribution of Silappadhikāram to the knowledge of the dance and drama of the period. The chapter dealing with the first public dance performance of Mādhavi gives detailed information of the great part played by dance in the cultural and social life of the higher classes of those days. The commentator writes in detail about all the features involved – the dancer, the dance instructor, the music teacher, the composer, the drummer, the flute player, the yāl-master, the stage, the talaiṅkol (post of honour awarded to the dancer), and the manner of dancing. His exclusive elaboration on music is not available, because his commentary on the kāṇalvāṇi chapter dealing with music has been lost.

The concept of mut-Tamil can thus be seen to be a very ancient one, in later days even when the divisions isai and nātakam had been lost or fallen into disuse, we find poets referring to mut-Tamil purely as a matter of tradition. Kambar mentions mut-Tamil *turai*⁴ and Avvai speaks of Sangha-Tamil *mūnru*⁵

As already mentioned, only iyal Tamil had grown through the centuries, in variety and depth and in volume, isai Tamil and nātaka Tamil had not had such growth, because perhaps of the extinction of all traditions of the sangham in later years. Jñāna Sambandha is a lone brave figure who vigorously upheld the cause of music, both by his singing in the temples and by his devotional songs set to music. No doubt the songs of the other Śaiva Ācāryas and Vaisnava Ālvārs are also set to music, but Sambandha was the only hymnologist who militantly took up the cause of music. Music and drama were firmly suppressed by Kalabhras, temporary overlords in Madurai during the 3rd to the 6th centuries A D, and it was Sambandha who restored isai Tamil back in the land to all its glory. Later it was taken up by Arunagiri nāthar in the 14-15th century and by music composers like Muttu Tāndavar, from the 18th century.

Nātaka Tamil, forgotten for a long time, had some flicker of life in the days of Rājarāja I⁷ and Kulōttunga I⁸, when their lives and deeds of valour were dramatised and enacted in the temples. But even that flicker died out, until dramas on the western model captured the minds of the people and they came to be enacted from the 19th century. Hundreds of dramas in which singing was an integral part were written and enacted in this period, covering religious and social themes. But the glory of nātaka Tamil as a division of mut-Tamil had died after the writing of Silappadhikāram and no one ever attempted to recapture that tradition, because all related literary material had been irredeemably lost, including the tradition

References

- 1 Adiyarkku nallar's preface to his commentary on the Padikam of Silappadhikāram
- 2 Silappadhikāram, chapters 3, 7 and 8
- 3 Adiyarkku nallar, commentary on chapter 6
- 4 Ramayanam (9th century), Balakandam verse 5, Rajam's edition 1958, turai – division
- 5 Invocatory verse to Nalvali (12th century), munru – three
- 6 Vide Tiruppuhal of Arunagiri nathar and Padangal by Muttuttandavar
- 7 Annual Report on S I Epigraphy for 1930-31, para 12, South Indian inscriptions, Vol II No 67
8. Inscription 198 of 1919.

IYAL TAMIL - TAMIL GRAMMAR

The first division of Tamil as we have seen is iyal Tamil, Tamil as it is spoken and written, this is literary Tamil. All literature constitutes iyal Tamil, and grammar¹ is that which speaks of the general rules governing this division. The earliest Tamil grammar is said to be Agattiyam by Sage Agastiya, who had written on all the three divisions of Tamil. It was the source of authority for the first sangham but in the deluges that occurred, it is said to have been lost, along with a very vast body of literature which preceded it.

Tolkāppiyar is said to have composed the treatise on grammar in his name in the second Sangham,² and it is a miracle that it is available to us in full even today, while many a book, composed at a much later date, has been lost. He divided his subject into three parts - eluttu (orthography), sol (etymology) and porul (subject matter of poetry or literature). A vast body of writing on each part came into existence in the centuries after him. During the Kalabhra interregnum at Madurai, the porul part seems to have been suppressed, this gave rise to the production of Iraṇyanār kalavṛyāl, on only one section of the original - namely the kalavṛyāl or clandestine or pre-marital love. A beautiful commentary was written on it immediately.

and a very fine legend also grew about it. The Kalaviyal departs in many ways from the original, as is only to be expected. Its author (Irāyanār) had evidently no access to the original Tolkāppiyam, and he had to write it anew, from a general knowledge of the subject, we need not presume that he knowingly deviated from the other. The commentary is written in a wonderful prose which is still studied with admiration by all scholars, it is also the earliest piece of extant Tamil prose.

The 8th and the 9th centuries appear to have been a period of hectic activity on grammar writing, a second Agastya, a second Tolkāppiyar and many other disciples of Agastya lived during this period and composed scores of treatises on all the branches of Tamil and very much enlarged the scope of Tolkāppiyam, but all their works are lost.³ To give one example, a manual on puram, on the 12 divisions of this subject was written under the title Pannuru patalam,⁴ the Twelve Chapters, but it is also lost. In the next century (9th) Ayyan Āritan wrote his treatise, Purapporul venbā mālai, as an adaptation of Pannuru patalam, his book is available and it has also an ancient gloss written on it. At about the same period another book on the ahapporul, by name the Tamil neri vīlakkam, was written and we have only a fragment of it.⁵ The available fragments of the various books on prosody and poetics, written in the 8th and the 9th centuries, were collected together in the name of Pannuru pāṭṭiyal,⁶ in the next century. The century after that witnessed the writing of two books on prosody by Amītasāgara, *Yāpparunkalam*⁷ and its Kārikai,⁸ both have elaborate commentaries written on them by the author's own disciples ; the Kārikai is the popular treatise that is studied by students of Tamil prosody even today

The nūr pā (āsiryappā) was the metre employed in the grammatical works till then For the first time, Amītasāgara breaks the convention and writes his shorter manual in the kattalai kaṭṭurai metre, which was later evolved from the kaḷippā, and in which the syllables in each line are measured as 16 and 17. Later writers begin to employ the venbā and the viruttam metres

*Vīrasōliyam*⁹ was the next work and it deals with the five branches and it is indeed an innovation on Tolkāppiyam Besides its three divisions, this book adds two more – prosody and rhetoric, and the five have since come to be known as the panca laksana, the five-fold grammar Dandi's rhetoric¹⁰ is the next important work, written in the next century (12th) Gunavīra-pandita, at the same period wrote his *Nēminātām*¹¹ on orthography and etymology, and his *Vaccanandi mālai*¹² on poetics Nārkaṇṇirāja nambī wrote his *Ahapporul vīlakkam*¹³ on aham, and it is the most widely read book today on that subject Pavanandi's *Nannūl*¹⁴ (the good book) is the most important work of this period ; it deals with only the first two divisions It is quite a valuable book and it has even superceded Tolkāppiyam Minor works had been written during the later centuries till the 17th, when Vaidyanātha Dēśika wrote his most compendious work, *Ilakkana vīlakkam*¹⁵ on the five branches Tonnūl vīlakkam and Muttuvīriyam were written in the next two centuries, but the fact remains that Nannūl holds the field and will continue to hold it for many years to come

We should bear in mind that rules of grammar are not written down as classical textbooks in verse, in the modern European languages, only Tamil and Sanskrit have made the study of grammar also a science

Notes and References

- 1 Ilakkanam (grammar), signifying the lakshana of poetry and other literature, seems to be purely a Tamilian concept, this significance is not found in early Sanskrit
- 2 Adiyarkku nallar's commentary on the padikam of Silappadhikaram
- 3 Vide my forthcoming History of Tamil Literature, 8th century and 9th century (Tamil)
- 4 Vide the prefatory verse on the Purapporul venbamalai Dr Swaminatha Ayyar's edition 1953, page 1
- 5 Tamil neri vilakkam edited by Dr Swaminatha Ayyar, 1937
- 6 Edited by R Raghava Ayyangar, 1951, Madurai Tamil Sangam
- 7 Edited by S Bhavanandam Pillai, in two volumes 1916 and 1917
- 8 Edited by Govindaraja Mudaliyar, 1934
- 9 Ed ibid, Bhavanandar Academy, 1942
- 10 Dandi alankaram edited by V M Satakopa ramanujachariar, 1962.
- 11 Neminatam edited by Govindaraja Mudaliyar, 1964
- 12 Vaccanandi malai edited by Sennakesavalu Naidu, 1908
- 13 Nambi ahapporul, Madurai Tamil Sangham 1926
14. Nannul- Mayilainathar 1918, Sanjara Namasivayar 1935 - both edited by Dr Swaminatha Ayyar
15. Ilakkana vilakkam, edited by Damodaram Pillai, 1890.

TOLKĀPPIYAM

The book perhaps takes its name from the author, Tolkāppiyar. The title means the ancient classic, this is certainly a fact. It is a grammatical treatise, and so naturally it was preceded by centuries of a rich heritage of literary output and tradition. Tolkāppiyam lays down rules for the different types of poetic composition, these rules were of course extracted from books which existed earlier than the author.

Tolkāppiyam treats of only iyal Tamil. It is divided into three books – eluttu (orthography), sol (etymology) and porul (subject matter). Some scholars are fond of tracing most of the contents of the first two books to Sanskrit sources, but the third book, porul, is wholly the author's own – in conception, classification, and elaboration. Each of the books contains nine chapters, perhaps the author did plan the books to be uniform in size and arrangement. The number of nūrpā in the books is 483, 464 and 652 respectively.

Tradition says that Tolkāppiyam was published in the court of Nīlam taru tīruvīr Pāndiya, when Atankōttāsān presided, Panampāranār wrote the introduction or commendatory verse for the book. Both Atankōttāsān and Panampāranār, along with Tolkāppiyar, were students of Agastya. Many centuries later, another writer composed a general preface to the book. Panampāranār's introduction says that Tolkāppiyar was well versed in the Aindra-vyākaraṇa of Sanskrit, that book is not available, but Tolkāppiyam clearly indicates that its author was familiar with the Sanskrit rules on grammar. He has made rules in his book for absorbing Sanskrit words.¹

The first book deals with letters. The classes of the letters, the place of the letters, the place of origin of the sounds, and the coalescence of letters when words come together form the subject of the nine sections of this book. The definition of the units of sound for the various types of letters in this book is a valuable contribution to this subject. The concept of an u, shorter than the short u is equally important.

The second book deals with words. Its nine sections deal with the class of words (denoting higher or lower beings or things), gender and conventions, the cases and their import, the vocative case in particular, exceptions, then words of action, the particle and adjectives and adverbs, the last section hereof deals with the four kinds of words – the common or natural words, borrowed words, indigenous literary words and words of Sanskrit origin, and their significance. He mentions the Sen-Tamīl territory as twelve, these are not clearly known now. The three ruling dynasties are also referred to. Tolkāppiyar confined borrowed words to the twelve regional territories,² later the author of Nannūl added the traditional eighteen territories also (excluding the Sen-Tamīl territory).

The third book is Porul adhikāram. Of its nine sections five deal with aham, one with puram, one each with similes, prosody and idioms. The Tamilian convention of classifying physiographical regions as the four – kurinji, mullai, marutam and neidal, and specifying the people who live there, their general pursuits, the seasons and the daily hours which are special to each region, the emotion of love that is most applicable to each region, the natural setting, animals and birds and the tutelary deities – starts from Tolkāppiyam. The author does not consider pālai – the desert region – as the fifth region, its classification as the fifth has been adopted much later. Though Tolkāppiyar held the regions as only four, he held the conventional conduct in love poetry, tinaṭi, to be five. Along with these five – aiṇṭṭinaṭi, he added two more, one-sided love (kakkilar) and improper love (perum tinaṭi). This classification has been adopted by later writers and no one has bettered it. The regions and the conventional conduct in the love theme is symbolized by five flowers – kurinji the hills, mullai the forest, marutam the plains, neidal the sea coast and pālai the desert. The themes associated with these are kurinji – union of the lovers, mullai – separation, marutam – patient waiting under separation, neidal – waiting on account of separation, and pālai – the woes of separation. Tolkāppiyam gives the themes and their elaboration only as isolated or stray topics, while later grammars like Nambī ahapporul and the kōvai poems string them together into a continuous narrative.

Just as aham also means a house and a domestic life, its external counterpart puram means mostly war in the ancient past. The activities connected with war are also grouped into seven categories or tinaṭ. War generally commences with the aggressor marching into the enemy's country and capturing his herds of cattle. There were in war certain ethical codes, which laid down that the cows and some similar objects are not to be hurt, and so this preventive action. Flowers are always associated with the war activities. Eight flowers are mentioned. The raiding forces which capture the herds wear the vetci (ixora) flowers as a symbol of their raid, and so on.³ Corresponding to the laurel which is a symbol of victory, the eighth activity we have here the vāhaṭ (albizzia).

Among the other chapters of the book, that on prosody is important. It had evolved into a separate and full division of Tamil grammar and many books have been written on the subject. Some of them at least are extant today. The term used to denote poetry was seyyul and according to the author it means not only verse, but many other types of composition besides. However such types do not have any wide currency. The elegance of poetic composition, vanappu, is said to be eight by Tolkāppiyar.⁴ Later critics had tried to equate all later literary production with one or the other of these. But these again had no currency, and what the author meant is obscure.

The chapter on marapu is important. It records many literary conventions for posterity. Many of them have passed out of use, but yet it has helped in the evolution of the later nighantu (lexicon) writing.

A grammarian is normally concerned only with the letters, and syntax. It is indeed unique that Tolkāppiyar has taken up the study of the subject matter of poetry also in his grammatical treatise. We do not have any treatise earlier than his. But since he himself always says 'it is said', 'they say so', 'scholars say so', it is evident that there were earlier treatises which dealt with grammar in this manner. Hence we should take it that the tradition in Tamil is to consider the subject matter also, in a book on grammar.

It is not easy to recapture all the thoughts recorded in an analytical treatise of a thousand years ago, when the continuity is broken or forgotten. But the first commentator Ilampūranar has done this for Tolkāppiyam, by his commentary written a thousand years after the original. His commentary on the three books is fully available. It was the basis for Naccinārkkiniyar who has also commented on the whole book. In between the two, many writers wrote glosses on the second book, the gloss by Sēnāvaraiyar is considered to be a masterpiece. Only a fragment of Pērāsiriya's commentary on porul is available. These writers open out for us magic fields as it were of enchanting life and thought, and language and literature, the richness and variety of which the Tamils could not have even dreamed of but for them. The richness of Tolkāppiyam far excels these.

References

- 1 Tolkappiyam, Solladhikaram, chapter 9 5
- 2 Ibid 9 4
- 3 Cf The practice of the contesting teams in a modern games tournament wearing different coloured uniforms, the flowers stood in the place of these uniforms
- 4 Ibid. Poruladhikaram 8 227-234.

TAMIL RHETORIC

In any well developed language, rhetoric, or the branch of grammar dealing with ornamentation of expression in speech and writing, is also a well developed branch. In Sanskrit and in Tamil, this has taken the form of a separate science or śāstra, called alankāra (in Sanskrit) and simply anī in Tamil. Every one, from the humblest to the highest, uses figures in his speech and this is the subject of anī. The term is not known to Tolkāppiyar but he does deal with the figure uvamar (similes) in detail. When at a later stage Tamil was considered to have the five branches of analytical grammar, anī was placed as the fifth branch. Vīrasōliyam (11th century) is the only early treatise which deals with the five parts in detail, but we find there has been a treatise on anī by name the Anūyal,¹ by the 8th century. The book is not extant today, but a few citations therefrom are available. These seem to indicate that the work was purely of Tamil origin. Vīrasōliyam confesses² that it borrows everything from the Sanskrit Kāvyaadarśam of Dandi.

A later writer, given the same name Dandi, after the Sanskrit writer, has composed the Tamil Dandi Alankāram, which is the most widely used text on the subject today. Figures of speech here are principally of two categories: one which goes by the sense and the other which goes by the sound alone. All figures like the simile, metaphor etc , come under the first and it is the one which gives beauty to expression and meaning Pun and such like figures which create an effect only through sound are of a lower order of figures, if we may say so, and they are not generally found in the older classical poems. They are mere gymnastics in words and sound, indulged in by later versifiers who are barren of poetic imagination and artistic thought Dandi deals with both The second category had come to hold the field, when petty poets sought the patronage of small local chieftains, on the disappearance of the three royal princes in Tamilnad and of their patronage

Māran Alankāram, an original work and Kuvalayānandam, adaptation from a Sanskrit source, are two important manuals on the subject written in the 16th and the 19th centuries, but they had never any great popularity Māran Alankāram is a very ambitious work, written by a gifted author who had himself written all the examples for his figures Usually in Dandi and all the other grammatical treatises, the commentaries and their citations are even more valuable than the treatises themselves

Notes and References

- 1 Vide the note on Ani iyal, page 551 and 623 in my History of Tamil Literature 12th century (Tamil)
- 2 Virasoliyam, Bhavanandar Academy edition 1942, verses 143, 149, 160.

THE LEXICONS

NIGHANTU

There are many lexicographical books called Nighantu, in the Tamil language, dating from the ninth century. Some word meanings were indicated in Tolkāppiyam, in the Uṇṇiyal (qualifying words), Itaiyiyal (particles) and Marappiyal (literary usage) sections. The words listed and explained are only 120. The first full-fledged lexicon is Divākaram of Divākarar. It consists of twelve sections, the first ten dealing with different class vocabularies, the eleventh dealing with homonyms and the twelfth dealing with group names. What we generally call a dictionary is the subject matter of section eleven. The first ten sections conform to the treatment contained in a modern thesaurus. The subject matter of the first ten sections is - celestial beings and bodies, human beings and the organs of the body, animals etc., plants, places, natural objects, tools etc., qualities, actions, sounds and words. This general arrangement of subject matter seems to have been conveniently adopted by all the later lexicographers.

Pingalantai is the second nighantu. It is more elaborate and it also deviates from the subject arrangement of Divākaram. The number of words dealt with in this is about 15,000 as against 10,000 in Divākaram.

The next important nīghantu is Cūdāmaṇi nīghantu of Mandala puruḍa. He follows Divākaram in his arrangement of the subject matter but has written his work in the viruttam metre as against the ahaval or blank verse of the other. Viruttam lent itself to a little singing and so was easy of memorising. We have seen all pupils in the village schools, even up to the end of the first quarter of the present century, memorising this nīghantu or at least the eleventh section thereof, which had come to be known as the Eleventh Nīghantu. This was an advance on all the earlier nīghantu works, and a nīghantu meant only this book. All other books numbering more than a score have only a historical value.

Next to Cūdāmaṇi nīghantu, two other books deserve mention here. One is Aharāḍi nīghantu, by Rēvana siddha, here the author has dropped the subject classification and adopted a new arrangement, where the words defined occur as the first words in each nūrṇā (verse), in the alphabetical order. He coined the term aharāḍi to denote this arrangement of an alphabetical order and the term has stuck. The modern aharāḍi, the name for a dictionary, is an application of this term. Another book is Porul tohai nīghantu of a much later period, which deals only with group names.

DICTIONARY

From these, we pass on to the complete modern dictionary. The first such book was the one compiled by Supradīpa kavirāyar for Beschi. It contained four sections and was called Catur aharāḍi. This did away with the ancient arrangement of the subject matter and listed all the words into one series arranged in the strictly alphabetical order. The first part is the ordinary modern dictionary, the second dealt with synonyms, the third with group names, and the fourth was a dictionary of rhymes. When we have passed on to the age of science and technology, the latter three sections which were intended to help the versifier fell into disuse, and only the first section has continued in importance as a regular dictionary.

The most outstanding dictionary in modern times is of course the Tamil Lexicon, prepared under the auspices of the Madras University and completed with a supplement in 1939. It gives meanings as usual with all grammatical features, and illustrative quotations. The meanings are arranged generally in a chronological sequence, where research of the period permitted this. Since the lexicon work was started with an Englishman at the head, it gives not only English meanings, but also an English transliteration. It is a great work of which any language and any nation can be proud. All credit to its learned and selfless editor Vaidyanathan Pillai.

Notes

Apart from the edition of Tandavaraya Mudaliyar in 1835, Divakaram is yet to see a scholar's edition. The first edition of Pingalam was by Sivan Pillai in 1890 and it was done well. But mistakes therein caused by the transposition of the leaves in the manuscript are yet to be corrected. Cudamani has been issued by the Navalar press at Cidambaram in several editions. Aharadi nighantu and Porul tohai nighantu had been edited well and issued by the Madurai Tamil Sangham in 1921 and 1920. For an exhaustive treatment of the nighantu, vide my History of Tamil Literature 10th century (Tamil) pages 204-5,

TAMIL ISAI

We have spoken in an earlier section about Tamil Isai as the second division of mut-Tamīl. All the earlier commentators like the author of Kalaviyal urai and Adiyārkkū nallār give elaborate references to Isai Tamil works and grammatical treatises on the subject. The metre paripādal, perhaps a very ancient one mentioned in Tolkāppiyam, was said to be suited to music. A fragment of the sangam anthology of the same name, Paripādal, (22 songs out of the traditional 70) is available and it gives the names of 13 composers, and 10 musicians who wrote the notations therefor. The songs¹ are composed on Muruga, Tīrumāl (Viṣṇu), the river Vāigai and the city of Madurai. However, the metre and the type of poem is totally absent in the whole range of Tamil literature from that period to the modern day (excepting perhaps an attempt by the author of *Pā-pāvinam*², 16th century, who wrote five paripādal verses merely for illustration purposes). Silappadhikāram gives us a glimpse into the musical literature and also the grammar of music of the period in its chapters like the Kānalvāri, but the whole body of that literature and grammar have been lost. Adiyārkkū nallār, the commentator of Silappadhikāram, cites many musical works and says that almost all of them had been lost before him. He says that Isai nunukkam, written by Śikhaṇḍi a disciple of Agastya in order to teach music to Sārakumāra, and Indrakāliyam had been his sources for the division of Isai ³ These two, along with many other books, had since been lost. Hence the tradition of the ancient Tamilian music seems to have had only an interrupted history.

The reason for the disappearance of many books on music and drama is the suppression, during the Kalabhra interregnum, of Tamil classics on music and drama, and on ahapporul (love poetry), as tending to stimulate the lower passions of man and lead him away from a life of righteousness.

However, music had a marvellous revival in the 7th century onwards through the singing of Tiru Jñāna Sambandha. No doubt all the Śaiva canon and the Vaisnava canon from the 7th to the 9th centuries had been set to music. But it was Sambandha who carried on an active campaign for music. He always called himself Jñāna Sambandha, learned in isai Tamil ⁴ No other ācārya campaigned for isai as much as he did. His struggle with the Jains was on two fronts, one religion and two music. He had sung many varieties of pan (musical tunes), and he was also familiar with musical instruments. His influence caught on and from him started the singing of devāram in the temples during specific hours and occasions. The Chola emperors who ruled from the 9th century patronised devaram music and gave magnificent grants to temples and singers to encourage this singing.

The pāna community seems to have been the custodians of music and drama in early Tamilnad. But the vicissitudes of fortune of the ruling classes during the Kalabhra period seem to have also wiped out the pāna class, for lack of patronage. When Nambiyāndarnambi recovered devāram with the help of Rājarāja Chōla, persons who knew the music were rare so he had to go to distant Erukkattampuliyūr to find a musician to set the tune for the devāram hymns. This was the place of Tiru Nīlakantha yālppāna who accompanied Jñāna Sambandha on the yāl. Nambi's hopes at finding a musician there were fulfilled, a young pāna girl who knew music was found there, she was brought to Lord Nataiāja's temple in Cidambaram and she set the tunes to the hymns.⁵ Thereafter, they were sung in those tunes in all the temples.

Tamil isai, in spite of its chequered career, continued as popular music through the temples and the temple orchestra, and to this day it has been existing only in this form. Devāram music was played on the Tamilian instrument called nādasvaram, which has perpetuated it through the centuries with an unbroken continuity. The fortunes of monarchies changed and, in spite of various religious and political onslaughts by alien powers, the nādasvaram instrument had kept alive the soul of Tamil isai.

In the days of the Chōla supremacy, we learn that Kulōttunga Chōla I was a great musical composer and that his queen used to sing his compositions.

Arunagiri nāthar in the 15th century gave a great impetus to the singing of music through his Tiruppuhal songs which are nothing if they are not rhythmic melodious music. Millions sang them in all their social and temple gatherings, and continue to sing so in musical concerts even today.

Under the Nāyak and the Mahratta rulers in Tamīlnad, Tamil musical composition enters a new phase. What is now called the kīrttanam was evolved in course of time. The modern bhajana was fully influenced by the Mahrattas and was an evolution from the group singing of the Tamils, which had been in vogue through the singing of the Devāram and the Tiruppuhal songs. Perhaps the first kīrttanam in the Tamil language was written by a minor poet who sang a kīrttanam song in 1654 A. D. ⁷ to celebrate the event of the installation of the image of Tiruccendūr Muruga which was thrown into the sea by the Dutch, but reclaimed by Vadamalaiyappa pillai, the administrator of Tirunelvēli under Tirumalai Nāyak.

The next century witnessed the evolution of the three first composers of Tamil kīrttanam, namely Muttu Tāndavar, Arunācala kavī and Mārimuttā pillai.

Muttu Tāndavar of Cidambaram was of a pious and saintly temperament. Coming of the piper community, music and devotion to Lord Natarāja was in his blood and he went on singing kīrttanams and padams. A padam is an erotic poem depicting in kīrttanam form the pining of a love-sick damsel for the love of God. His songs became immediately popular and are the great attraction in the musical concerts even in the twentieth century. They transport one to unknown realms of spiritual yearning and peace and breath into the audience an atmosphere of solace and comfort, in spite of their being in a love-song form. Most of them are also adapted for dance.

Arunācala kavī of Śikāḷi wrote the kamayana in kīrttana form; it is a long serious opera, if we may use the term It also became immediately popular and thousands of religious discourses on the Rāmāyana to the accompaniment of his musical pieces have been held in Tamilnad, keeping the audience spell-bound, both by the thought content and by the drama and music of the songs

Mārimuttā pillai of a village near Śīkāli had also written a few padams which had captured the imagination of the Tamil people even in the third and the fourth decades of this century by their supplication to Lord Natarāja, as in Muttu Tāndavar All the three were contemporaries and lived about the middle of the 18th century Arunācala kavī and Mārimuttā pillai had also written many other literary works.

The element of music had been incorporated into many semi-dramatic pieces like the kurāvaṇi from the beginning of the 18th century There have been many writers in the 19th century who had written scores of dramatic musical pieces on the model of the Rāmanātaka of Arunācala kavī Gōpālakṛiṣṇa Bhārati is the greatest of them all He lived in the middle of the last century and by his Nandanār kīrttana, he even excelled Arunācala kavī, both in emotional content and musical appeal His songs could move a heart of stone even today and, for the period of more than a century and over, they have helped to direct even the uneducated masses along the pathway to God

The famous Telugu composer Tyāgarāja lived during the period between the days of Arunācala kavī and of Gōpālakṛiṣṇa Bhārati He lived in Tīruvaiyāru on the banks of the Kāvēri. His mother tongue was Telugu He was of an intensely devotional temperament He wrote numerous kīrttanāms on the tunes and model of the Tamil music which he saw around him, sung of course in the local language When he sang, he no doubt used his mother tongue Telugu He was a great bhākta and a gifted composer and so his songs had become immensely popular from about the end of the 19th century and continue to be so to this day. Swāmī Rāmalinga^s and many other less gifted persons had composed innumerable kīrttanams during the last century Vēdanāyakam pillai wrote his Sarva samaya samarasa kīrttanai towards the end of the last century. But he was not a musician and his songs, though they had thought content, were weighed down with artificial alliteration and rhyme so heavily that no musician ever sang any of his songs anywhere But Tyāgarāja's songs had attained such popularity that musicians sang only his compositions to the exclusion of all Tamil songs With the political awakening throughout the nation, a reaction to Tyāgarāja also set in in the musical field and there was a legitimate clamour for Tamil songs, songs which the Tamil people could follow, not only for their music but also for their thought content Many new books of Tamil kīrttanams of varying value came to be written recently by different authors who had more Tamilian fervour than musical perception, artistic equipment or emotional urge Few indeed are the modern compositions which can stand the test of time.

References

- 1 Paripadal edited by Dr. Swaminatha Ayyar 1935.
2. Pa-pavinam, Madurai Tamil Sangham 1932, pages 72-88.

- 3 Silappadhikaram, Dr. Swaminatha Ayyar 1927, page 10
- 4 Sambandhar devaram verses 44, 54, 348, 425, 700, 1090, 3459 etc
- 5 Umapathi Sivacarya, Tirumurai kanda puranam, 32-34 et seq
- 6 Kalingattupparani verse 286, S Rajam's edition, 1960
- 7 Kirttanam by Venṛimalai Kavirayar, in Vadamalai venba page 31
- 8 The works of Ramalinga swami, Kirttanaip-pahuti, A Balakrishna Pillai's edition 1933

DANCE AND DRAMA

DANCE

In the chapter on Mut-Tamīl, we had indicated how dance and drama was considered as the third division of Tamil Literary production. Agastya, the first grammarian, is said to have written a treatise on this branch also, but along with the other parts, this part is also not available, the three parts seem to have been lost even at the time of the first commentary writers. The only work which gives us any glimpse of the conception of the drama in Tamil of the period two thousand years ago is Silappadhikāram, its two commentaries, coming probably 800 – 900 years after the book itself, seem to have had just a peep into the very wide range of the literature on music and dance of the Silappadhikāram period and nothing more, because almost all the texts had ceased to exist by then. Madurai was the seat of the Pāṇḍiyas who nourished the poetry of the period and extended their patronage to the Tamil poets around the beginning of the Christian era. But the Pāṇḍiya kingdom had been overrun by a band of alien marauders, called Kalabhras in the third century A. D. and as these were of a religious persuasion which was alien to the one in the land, and as they practised an extreme austerity in the matter of not only religion but also of art and all life, they suppressed all vestiges of Tamil art and letters. We have explained elsewhere how the valuable contribution of Tolkāppiyam, namely ahapporul, was suppressed. As music and dance were the opposites of religious austerities as understood by them, these had been ruthlessly suppressed. The Kalabhras held sway over Madurai for about three hundred years and had wiped out many aspects of Tamil letters. That is the reason why we do not have a single ancient classical treatise on music and dance, although Silappadhikāram commentators mention scores of such works and say that they had been lost.

We learn from Silappadhikāram that Adiyārkkunallār based his writing on Isai nunukkam and Indrakāliyam for musical subjects, and the Pancamarapu, Bharata sēnāpatiyam and Matwānar nātakat-Tamil nūl for the subjects of dance and drama. Details had been elaborated for the dancer, the dance instructor, the music master, the composer, the drummer, the flutist, the yāl player, the stage, the inauguration and the dance.² About a hundred types of kūttu or dance have been casually mentioned by the commentator.³

The concept of dance had taken root in Tamil literature and had had a great elaboration, probably from the concept of Lord Natarāja as the Cosmic Dancer. The concept of Natarāja is purely Tamilian and this has passed on from religion and legend to literature also. Natarāja is said to have performed seven types of dances. Other classical dances performed by various deities are the eleven, from alliyam to kodukottu.⁴ All these details had been taken up in literature and we find in Silappadhikāram mention of the dances and a large variety of types of kūttu, abhinaya or pose pictured by the hand and the fingers, and presentation of emotions and sentiments through silent postures of the organs of the body including the hands and the fingers. All these had been evolved as an independent and extensive science of dance through the Tamil language, perhaps by the centuries before the Christian era and, as already noted, we are permitted only a peep into that rich heritage and nothing more. Remnants of that dance had been revived and given a new lease of life under the Imperial Cholas from the 9th to the 13th centuries, by the institution of the temple pipers and temple dancers. What was left of those dances, after the Muslim onslaughts of the 14th century and later, has been handed down to us by the pipers who were the temple musicians and the temple dancers in the form of the bharata-nāṭya and abhinaya which we have today. There was a Bharata śāstra in Tamil according to Adiyārkkunallār.⁵ The Bharata śāstra and similar Sanskrit works, which are spoken of today, are but natural evolutions from the very ancient Tamil dance and dance literature.

Manuals of grammar and literature tell us that there were different troupes of dancers such as the pānar, vīraliyar, kūttar and *porunar*⁶ in the sangham age and the period immediately following, they specialised in music and dance and drama. They flourished under the patronage of kings and local chieftains. But when social life underwent a change during the Kalabhra rule, then, during the days of the Nāyanmārs and the Ālvārs, and lastly under the Chōla administration, the order of the pānas gradually disappeared and with them that ancient dance and drama of Tamil literature.

Dance had however a religious revival under the Chōla emperors as an adjunct of temple worship and in that form, it has continued to this day

DRAMA

Now we shall pass on to drama. Although we can fill volumes with material on dance, we do not have much material from the past on the drama, as we know it today. The dramatic element is present in a wonderful measure in the great epics like Kamba Rāmāyanam, devotional poetry like Tiruvācakam and minor poems like Nandik-kalambakam, but the drama with definitely marked acts and scenes and the entry and exit of characters, as we see in the English Shakespearean plays, is not found in the Tamil literature. However, we learn through inscriptions that dramas were really enacted in the temples on the occasion of the annual temple festivals at Tanjavūr and other places during the days of the Chōla supremacy. Rājarāja vijayam and *Rājarājēśvara nātakam*⁷ were enacted in the Tanjavūr temple, these presumably were dramatic portrayals of the victories and glory of Rājarāja I. Rājēndra II had endowed valuable gifts of rice for enacting those dramas. There was also a Pūmpuliyur nātakam,⁸ enacted during the temple festivals of Tirup-pādiripuliyūr in the days of Kulōttunga I. These stray examples only tell us that there had been popular dramas in those days enacted for the entertainment of vast gatherings of people on festival occasions. But unfortunately, we do not have any single specimen of such plays.

Many centuries pass before we see again anything like the vestiges of drama in literature. The 17th century and the later years have combined orthodox literature with folklore and have produced a kind of operas depicting the many facets of rustic life. Three types gain popularity by the end of the 16th and the beginning of the 17th centuries. The first of these is the kuravanji, the damsel of the kurava clan. The kuravanji appears on the scene, reads the hand of a lovesick maiden, informs her that the Lord of her love, mostly the deity of the local temple, will reciprocate her love, gets many presents from her and departs with her own husband, who finds her here after a considerable search. Poetic imagery, the jingle of words and sounds, the rustic setting, the temple procession and the love theme, and above all simple popular music, all together weave a pattern of magic romance about the whole story that it is excellent reading, as well as supremely arresting acting. Kurrālak-kuravanji is the first and easily the best kuravanji of the kind. Later poems of the type had come to be written in praise of petty chiefs also. The Kūluva nātakam, is a shorter version depicting only one scene from the kuravanji, where the kurava and his companion the kuluva set out in search of the missing kuravanji.

The Pallu nātakam came into prominence by about the same time. While the kuravanji dealt with the hill life, the pallu dealt with the pastoral life. The theme is still more simple here. A palla labourer is a farm servant in a temple farm. The natural jealousy between his two wives causes the palla himself to be placed in fetters. The farm work is paralysed. They then come to their senses and cause the palla to be released and to complete the farm work.

This is principally a dance drama, and fully a folk-play of the masses, much more than the kuravanji. The pomp and glitter of that is absent here

The Nondi nātakam, also of about the same period, is a sort of monologue, where a lame man (nondi), the hero of the play, appears on the stage and enacts his own story. He is a wastrel whose escapades of amour and villainy have caused him loss of the leg and left him lame. The amorous stories in the narration were perhaps intended to appeal to the sensuous character of the petty chieftains of the 18th century to capture whose attention they were written.

With feelings of relief, we now turn to the devotional writers, the trio of the mid-18th century, Muttu Tāndavar, Mārimuttā pillai and Arunācala kavī. The last has written, besides many purāṇas and prabandhas, the Rāma nāṭaka kīrttana which is an opera based on Kamba Rāmāyaṇam. It is quite a long work and has been famous ever since it was written. Till the appearance of the cinema, it had thrilled hundreds of audiences, throughout the length and breadth of the country. The unlettered masses were greatly attracted to it, both by the element of devotion and by the element of music.

The outstanding merit of Rāma nāṭakam is said to be the delicate choice of the rāgas (musical modes) which are in perfect unison with the sentiments expressed by the several songs. The Rāmāyaṇam, both in Sanskrit and in Tamil, is followed by the Uttara kāṇḍa, here also, Ananta Bhārati wrote a large opera on the Uttara kāṇḍa on the model of Rāma nāṭakam.

A century latter, Gōpālakṛiṣṇa Bhāratī wrote his song - drama on the life of Saint Nandanār. The element of devotion and the music here are far superior, the songs of his opera have passed into the folklore of the Tamils and the work is immensely popular even today, when society is in the powerful clutches of the octopus called the cinema

As a drama-cum-musical composition, it is a masterpiece Bhāratī elaborated the short account of Sēkkilār, supplying flesh and blood to the story, creating characters and situations Devotion is the one keynote of the work and through this he displays all his powers of dramatisation, imagination and characterisation Himself a great musician, he had made this a supremely musical tribute to Natarāja through Nandanār, the drama is all the greater, because the high caste Brahmin is putting the devotion of the low caste Nanda into a musical drama Bhāratī had written a few other devotional operas, not so well known

Many large works such as Bhāratam, Bhāgavatam, Periya purāṇam, Kanda purāṇam, and Tiruvilaiyādal purāṇam, had been rendered into such musical dramas at about the same period. However, this kind of composition completely stopped from the beginning of the 20th century.

The popularity of Rāma nātakam, and later Nandanār nātakam, had made many writers try their hand at this kind of opera-making. Episodes from the Mahā-bhārata have easily lent themselves to this kind of writing and acting Scores of such drmaas were written in the 19th century and performed to packed houses; but their popularity had been only short-lived. An exception may be made in the case of the story of Hariscandra, the king who sacrificed everything, his wife and son and himself also, for the cause of Truth, it was popular even down to the middle of the 20th century. All these operas were known by the name Vilāsam.

The impact of western education had introduced Shakespearean literature to the English educated class. Some of the enlightened tried their hand at the writing of the literary drama on the Shakespearean model, principally for reading. The most famous of such dramas is Manōnmanīyam by Professor Sundaram Pillai, which has become a classic within half a century, in its own right. The plot was taken by him from an English story, but he has woven Tamilian flesh and blood into it to make it a realistic mediaeval Tamil drama. As in the English dramas he has adopted the blank verse for the drama Ravi varmā by the musical composer Lakshmana Pillai and several dramas and operas by other writers followed, but they failed to achieve any distinction.

Pammal Sambandha Mudaliyar was a great playwright of the 20th century. He was a member of the judiciary in Madras but he took to acting and organising amateur performances as a hobby. He lifted up the 20th century drama from the lowly condition of the open air street plays to the level of the cultured and educated classes and conferred dignity on the acting. He wrote about a hundred plays, all of which were acted, himself participating in most. He did the greatest service to the drama, the like of which had not been done or attempted anywhere. But yet, his plays fall short of being called literary works. The greatest popularisers of the good drama by the middle of the 20th century are the T K S brothers whose Avvai is deservedly famous.

No good literary work can be produced in the field of the Tamil drama for sometime. The trend of the times is such that depth and vision seem to be almost a taboo in such writing. The radio is also responsible for broadcasting vulgarity and coarseness and for making a virtue of it so much, that for some time no dramatic work can emerge as a work of art, or as a literary piece. The glamour of the vulgar cinema is such that the dramatic writer cannot raise his head against the lure of the sexy cinema for a long time to come.

References

- 1 Silappadhikaram, edited by Dr Swaminatha Ayyar page 10
- 2 Ibid pages 78-12
- 3 Ibid page 88,
- 4 Ibid page 89
- 5 Ibid page 9
- 6 Tolkappiyam, Poruladhikaram 91
7. S I I, Volume II No 67
8. S I I, Volume VII Nos 752-3

POETRY OF THE SANGHAM PERIOD. I ETTUT-TOHAI

We had stated in a previous section that by the beginning of the Christian era, the Third Sangham had flourished at the site of the present city of Madurai and had produced quite a large volume of poetry. Although some portions of that poetry are said to have been irretrievably lost, we yet have quite a large volume available now. These are grouped under two major heads – Ettut-tohai and Pattup-pāttu. Till recently, such groups as the 18 Kilk-kanakku and the five so-called major epics were vaguely called sangham poetry, these are no longer called so and we here confine our discussion to the first two groups only.

Though we have mentioned the major heads here as two, following the literary history and convention, it may not be wrong to say that they are really one of nine anthologies, Pattup-pāttu itself being in fact an anthology of long poems, while the first eight are anthologies of short lyrics ¹

ETTU-TOHAI

As the name indicates, here we have eight anthologies (tohai - collection). Of the eight, six may belong to the earlier period of the sangham age, while two others may belong to the end of the period. It is probable that when these verses and groups of verses were collected together, a sort of classification was made and the anthologies numbered as eight. A later day verse however gives the eight anthologies in the following order: Narrinai, Kuruntohai, Ainkuru nūru, Padirrupattu, Paripādal, Kalittohai, Aha nānūru and Pura nānūru. But this has nothing to do with their subject matter or with the process of their compilation.

The following might have been the process of compilation. Paripādal contains only musical pieces and so it formed a separate book. Kalittohai, comprising of verses only in the kalippā metre, forms another separate book. 500 short verses, in groups of 100 each on the five regions, having aham as their subject matter, constitute a separate book called Ainkuru nūru. Ten groups of ten verses each in praise of ten Śēra kings form a separate book, by name Padirrup-pattu. About 1600 separate verses were now left. Of these 400 stray verses with puram as their subject constitute another book, Pura nānūru. Lastly, we have about 1200 verses having as their subject aham. The number was perhaps thought to be very large and so it was split up into three books, based on the length of each verse – verses with lines 5 – 8 constituted Kurun-tohai, or the compilation of the shortest verses, the next group contained lines 9 – 12 and was called Narrinai, the last group containing poems which were left over had lines 13 – 31 and was called Nedun-tohai, longer verses or Aha nānūru. This surmise is possible because we find most of the poets singing songs which are found in several of the anthologies. Except Kalittohai and Paripādal, all the others are in the asiriyam metre,

Another noteworthy feature is that the compiler, the patron and the number of poets are mentioned in respect of the five aham anthologies, but not in respect of the three puram collections Padirrup-pattu, Paripādal and Pura nānūru ² Perundēvanār who had written the Bhāratam is said to have prefixed an invocatory verse, to the aham collections except the Kalittohai, and to Pura nānūru

Ettut-tohai (particularly the five books on aham) is essentially a collection and grouping of verses which are isolated and independent of one another. None of them is a narrative poem. But yet, each little verse enacts a scene in a drama, to understand the scene and the poem, the reader has to know the speaker, the person spoken to, and the context. Naturally this dramatic setting has given rise to many conventions. The Poruladhikāram of Tolkāppiyar is a codification of these conventions.

We shall now examine the eight books³ in detail, taking up the aham group first

THE FIRST THREE

The three anthologies, Kuruntohai, Narrinai and Aha nānūru are all love poems, sung by various authors. There are not only bards, but princes, women and brahmins also among the poets. The verses are all occasional verses, not set to any pattern. Almost all of them come from the mouth of some character, a hero, a heroine, his or her comrade, mother or a bystander. Hence the element of drama is always present. The poet never refers to himself but makes the character speak and act. A passing thought and a fleeting emotion are very vividly expressed in each verse, be it short or long. Similes and some elementary figures are never lacking, these only help the thought embedded in the character's words and give it greater force and vigour. Their very simplicity is the great hall-mark of their high poetry. The poet indents upon all nature to aid the emotional experience he is trying to put into words. Reading the few lines of the verses the reader will pause at every line, thoughts flit across his mind, and conjure up visions of nature, of life, which though simple in themselves, yet are poignant with subtle strains of feeling and experience. All the verses in all the three books will easily lend themselves to this understanding. Verses relating to the five tinai are found in each anthology.

Apart from the size of the poems, there is not much difference in the poetic or lyrical content of the verses in each collection. The longer verses have greater imagery and drama, while the shorter ones are more crisp and sweeter, and more elegant.

KURUN-TOHAI

This collection consists of the shortest separate poems. There are 205 poets represented here. The collection was made by one Pūrikkō. The name of the patron-king is not given. The number of verses is 401. They are not arranged in any order. Some of the sweetest and simple love poems are in this collection.

NARRINAI (NAL-TINAI)

This collection was made under the patronage of the Pandiya king, Pannāḍu tanda māraṇ vaḷudī, this king has also sung two verses in this collection and one in Kuruntohai. There are here 175 poets. The name of the compiler is not given. One verse in the book is missing

AHA NANURU

This collection has 400 verses. It is said to have been collected together by Rudra sarma, son of Madurai Uppūrīkudī kīlān, under the patronage of Pandiyan Ugrap-peruvaludī. Many legends had been woven around these two names. It will suffice if we say that they are also mentioned in the commentary on Iravānār kalaviyal. The patron is said to have sung a verse each in Aha nānūru and Narrinai. The number of poets here is given as 145. This compilation, unlike the others, has a curious arrangement of verses. Of the 400 numbers, all odd numbers are on the pālai tinaī, 1 e., 200 verses in effect. All tens on neidal; those having 4, 14, 24 etc. belong to mullai, 2 and 8 to kurinji, and 6 to *marutam*⁴. Since Aha nānūru verses are the longest (upto 31 lines) the compiler perhaps made this artificial arrangement, this may also indicate that this compilation was arranged later than the other two. We see here that the poets sang most on the pālai tinaī.

AINKURU NURU

Ainkuru nūru (the five short hundreds) is also in the āsiriyam metre and contains the contribution of five poets on the five tinais. All the verses are here very short, between 3 and 6 lines. Each hundred (sung by one poet) is divided into ten tens and each ten contains ten verses on the same theme. Often the opening phrases, and sometimes the first line itself, are repeated in each of the ten verses. This arrangement may tend to give a feeling of monotony. But in fact it is not so. As the verses are very short, the author has to plunge directly into his subject, without any padding or description. In some tens,⁵ each verse consists of only three lines, the first lines are repeated in full in all the ten, the author is left with only two lines for giving out his thoughts, but yet, he is able to paint a picture charged with emotion and subtle suggestion. The tens are named after animals and common objects, such as the elephant, the crab, the buffalo, the crane, the parrot, the peacock, the crow and the bangle, abstract thoughts like yearning, the city of Tondī, and the utterances of the characters. Perhaps we may notice here a touch of folk-lore in the choice of the titles. The arrangement of groups of verses into ten each found here and in Padirrup-pattu had come to stay. Kural itself is composed of ten verses to each section. In later literary history, we find the entire Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava canon to be composed of tens (padikams). Ainkuru nūru may be taken to be the fore-runner of the refrain arrangement found in such padikam writing.

The collection was made by Kūdalūr kīlār, under the patronage of the elephant-eyed Sēra, Māntaram Sēral-Irumporai. The compiler's songs (numbering four) are found in Kuruntohai and Pura nānūru.

KALIT-TOHAI

Kalit-tohai on the other hand is not a short poem but quite a long one. Many of the verses, because of the metre, lend themselves to involved construction, which appears to be in harmony with the involvement in the subject If the verses of Kurun-tohai etc. are brilliant polished gems, those of Kalit-tohai are jewels, where many such gems are set to make a beautiful and dazzling design of colour and brilliance.

Each verse is an elaborate drama, an one act play, in which often more than one character act their parts. There is a beginning in the drama, a course of development and a fitting finale or climax, all within the space of a single verse The kalippa metre has different arrangements of feet, which can be long or short, and can also expand in parts according to the needs of the subject Its diction also is sweet and musical and these lend to it a quality supple, chaste and well polished, often graceful and refined, far superior to the ruggedness of the asiriyam which is akin to the English blank verse The change of moods, the play of emotions and the delineation of character are all very well expressed in the kali verses. This kind of elasticity has led critics to conclude that Kalit-tohai can be only a later composition, though of the sangham period, but this need not necessarily be so.

This collection was made by Nallanduvanār, who had also written its section on nerdal.

PADIRRUP-PATTU

Next we come to the two puram poems Padirrup-pattu and Pura nānūru. The puram themes generally comprise all themes not contained in aham poetry They mostly deal with war and peace, giving and receiving, ethics and the larger truths bearing on life in general. Padirrup-pattu, as stated before, is ten tens, each ten glorifying the valour and benevolence of a Sēra prince, this praise of the Sēra is a unique feature, such exclusive praise in a distinct group of verses had not been extended to the other princes. The princes had rewarded the poets magnificently. Another unique feature of these poems is that a happy expression had been chosen from each verse and given as its title. As poetry, this poem is even more rugged than Pura nānūru. The poem mentions a settlement of Yavanar, perhaps the Ionian Greeks, and this helps scholars to fix the date of the poem, and lends further support to the age of the sangham. The first and the last tens of the collection are missing.

PURA NANURU

Pura nānūru occupies a unique place not only in the sangham poetry, not only in the History of the Tamil Literature, but also in the history of the Tamil race and its culture. It is not possible even to refer to its many contributions to the history of our culture in this short survey, but we shall merely refer to a few. There is a brilliant galaxy of great writers, men and women, bards and kings, young and old, rich and poor, high and low, who have contributed poems to the work. King Nedunceliyan sings of the importance of education. Friendship means intensity of feeling and not frequent personal contact, the story of Kōpperum Chōḷa and Pīsir Āndai is a monumental example. A defeated prince dies of thirst, rather than get water as a captive from the warder who is in charge of his prison. Many are the poems which portray the bravery and heroism of women as mothers and as wives. The queen of Bhūta Pāndiya rebukes the elders who dissuade her from giving up her life on the death of her husband, and valiantly and dutifully dies in the flames which consume his body. Another poet advises the ruler against indiscriminate taxation; the ruler should realise that the king, and not food and water, is the sustenance for the subjects. The world goes by the services of self-sacrificing individuals who ceaselessly strive for the welfare of humanity.

‘Any place is my place and the whole world is kin, the good and the bad do not accrue from another, death has always been there, living is neither sweet nor bitter, life goes on in the manner ordained, we neither bow to the great nor taunt the lowly’ says one poet ⁶

‘All persons, be they princes or peasants, require only a measure of rice for food, and two bits of cloth to cover the body, other needs are equal, hence the best use of riches is giving, if we expect to enjoy everything, most will escape us’ says another ⁷

A Chōla prince says ‘There are people like the little field mouse, which fills its hole with the mature grains in the fields. There are yet others like the valiant tiger, which pursuing a wild boar for food, declines to eat it because it fell to its left, it goes without food that day, and the next day it fells a he-elephant on its right and eats it, let me have more days of companionship with men of such calibre’ ⁸

Says King Nedunceliyan ‘If I do not carry out my word in crushing my foes, may poets cease to sing the praises of my kingdom’. This asseveration indicates the great esteem in which the rulers held the poets and their composition in those days

These instances are sufficient to give a glimpse of the lofty ideals and noble culture of the Tamils two thousand years ago

157 poets and 128 kings and chiefs are represented in this collection.

PARIPADAL

Lastly we take up Paripādal. It is a kind of musical verse whose very pattern and music have long been wholly lost. We have now only 22 out of the original 70 verses in the book. A colophon under each verse gives the name of the author, the musical mode and the name of the musician who wrote the notation. The songs are in praise of Muruga, Tirumāl, the city of Madurai, and the river Vaigai. That its thought content was of a very high quality, there is no doubt; a poet says, 'My Lord, I do not pray for wealth or gold, or for the pleasures of life, I pray Thee, grant me compassion, love and charity.'¹⁰ A large number of love themes are also treated in Paripādal. Enjoyment of life at its fullest can be found here, the songs on Vaigai speak of a rich and luxurious enjoyment of the river-side, in this sense it has no parallel in literature.

Isai or music is the second major division of Tamil, but isai-Tamil has been totally lost. The two commentaries on Silappadhikāram indicate to us the rich heritage of isai which had been there but was no longer available even in their days. Paripādal gives us a fragmental picture of that isai - Tamil, without the music No one had ever attempted the Paripādal metre, before or after, except the few paripādal verses in Pa - pāvinam Nothing is known about the compiler or his patron

Notes and References

- 1 There is a grouping in later times of the eight anthologies and ten idylls together, making a total of 18 as the 18 Melkanakku, a parallel to the 18 Kilkkanakku This has no sanction in literary usage
- 2 Sangha Ilakkīyam, Samajam Edition 1940, pages 1371-73
- 3 Of the eight books considered here, Kuruntohai, Aingurunuru, Padirruppattu, Purananuru and Paripadal have been edited by Dr Swaminatha Ayyar, the first with his own bright and lucid commentary, and the others with ancient commentaries of the 12-13 centuries Narrinai was edited with an original and scholarly gloss by Pinnattur Narayanaswami Ayyar Aha nanuru has a short commentary for only part of it, edited by R. Raghava Ayyangar Kalittohai with the brilliant commentary of Naccinarkkiniyar was edited by Anantarama Ayyar, and earlier by Damodaram Pillai Later editions are merely copies from these and are neither scholarly nor reliable
- 4 Vide the three verses commencing viyamellam on pages 1371-2 of Sanga Ilakkīyam, Samajam edition 1940
- 5 Vide verses (1-10, 31-40), 121-30, (151-60, 161-70), 341-50 and 431-40
- 6 Purananuru verse 192 7. Ibid 189. 8. 190 9. 72
10. Paripadal verse 6

THE POETRY OF THE SANGHAM PERIOD II. PATTUP - PĀTTU

Pattup - pāttu or the Ten Idylls are ten long separate poems¹ in the āsiriyam metre, ranging from 103 to 782 lines. Of the ten, six are on puram and four are on aham, again of the six, five are of the prabandha, arrup-padaṭ type. Of the six, one is in praise of Lord Muruga, while four are in praise of kings, and the last in praise of a local chief. Again, among the poets, Mudat-tāmakkanni is a woman who sang in praise of Karikāl Chōla. Two poems each have been sung by Nakkīrar and Rudram kannanār. Two of the major poets of the period, Kapilar, and Nakkīrar have sung in this group. The Chōlā King Karikāla and the Pāndiya King Nedunceliyan are some of those eulogised here.

We shall now proceed to examine each poem briefly, in the order in which it is found in Pattup-pāttu collection.

1. Tiru Murugarruppadaṭ by Nakkīrar is probably placed first in the Pattup - pāttu as an invocatory poem for the collection of ten. It is in praise of the traditional six camps of Lord Muruga. One who has enjoyed the grace of the Lord directs another to the Presence. He describes the six places vividly.

Description of nature, the manner of worship, the disciplined ways of His devotees, the life of the hill tribes and the conferment of His grace are all dealt with in graphic language. While speaking of the second shrine, the author describes at length the six countenances and the twelve arms of Muruga. The poem, though terse and difficult of comprehension, is repeated by rote today in thousands of Tamil homes as a devotional song, sometimes by semi-literates also. Muruga here is not any deity, but a manifestation of the Absolute.

2 Porunar-ārruppadaṭ by the poetess, Mudat-tāmakanni, directs the bard, who is a singer of battles, to go and get presents from King Karikāla. The popular legend that Prince Karikāla, though very young in years, assumed a garb of mature age in order to make two contesting parties have faith in his wisdom and judgement, is also referred to here. A great tribute is paid to the Kāvērī, the battle of the king at Venni is celebrated here. A tribute is also paid to the pālaiṭ-pan (a musical mode) which is said to be capable of winning over even the wild robbers of the desert. The poem is in the āsuriyam metre as is usual with all sangham poetry, but yet there are many lines in the vaṇṇi metre which is rare. The other works which have a large number of the vaṇṇi lines are Madurai-kāṇṇi and Pattinappālai.

3 Sīru-pān-arruppadaṭ is in praise of Nalliyakkōdan to whom the author Nattattannār directs a bard. Pānar are the bards who sing to the accompaniment of their instrument, the yāl. The yāl is of two kinds the smaller one and the bigger one and the pāṇas themselves are known after the instruments siru-yal and pēryāl, which they practised, as the sirupānar and the perumpānar, we have here two arrup-padais relating to the two classes of pānas. Of the two pān poems in this group, this is the shorter one. The bard's wife is described in detail, the cities of Tamiḻnad are celebrated and the generosity of the patron is extolled. The poem refers to the seven vallals (patrons) of the sangham age and says that this patron has the virtues of all the seven put together.

4 Perum-pān-ārruppadai. Here Rudram kannanār directs a bard to Ilantiraiyan of Kānci. The bard's instrument is described in detail, the hardships of travel, the people of the plains, the brahmin way of life, the coast, the city and the generosity of the patron are all given out in detail. The picture of the region of the five tinais, the respective people and their hospitality¹, the hospitalities of the brahmins etc. are done in a very interesting manner. The description of Kāncipuram and its festivals gives us perhaps a picture of pre-Pallava days. Viṣṇu at Tīru-Vehhā in the city is referred to.

5 Mullaip-pāttu is the shortest poem in this group. The hero leaves his wife for the battle front, Elders console her to bear with separation bravely. The war is over and he returns happily home. Many a description of the war front is given here, as well as the pangs of separation in the two, and also a description of the rainy season. The poem is by Nappūtānār. Mullai is the forest region. Omens, some elephant lore, and life in the encampments of the battle front are some of the chief features here.

6. Maduraik-kāṇṇi is the longest poem, sung by Māngudi Maruda, to instruct the Pāṇḍiya King Nedunceliyan of the transience of life. The several battles of the Pāṇḍiya, the prosperity of the city, its market place, the entertainments of the people, the festivities and similar things are described. Kāṇṇi means the transience of life. Some of the descriptions here serve as illustrations of the puram topics of poruladhikāram. The poem has also a number of references to contemporary history.

7. Nedunālvaḍai is by Nakkīrar. Pāṇḍiyan Nedunceliyan has gone to the battle front. There he goes a round of the battle field at dead of night, anxiously ministering to the wounded soldiers and animals. The heroine worships Korraṇai and prays for his speedy return. The description of the winter is remarkable. This is a neidal poem; one of despair under separation. This is considered to be one of the best poetic pieces of the period.

8. Kurinjī-pāṭtu is by Kapilar, intended to teach the Ārya prince Brhatta the beauties of Tamil (love poetry). Kurinjī is the hill tract. The poem speaks of clandestine love. Here, while saying that the heroine gathered flowers and piled them on a piece of rock, the author enumerates one hundred flowers. This is a glowing tribute to the author's observation of nature and his knowledge of the botanical science. Muruga the Lord of kurinjī is celebrated in a fitting manner. Perhaps Brhatta mastered Tamil love poetry so well that he was himself able to compose a poem on the subject.²

9 Pattinap pālai. This is also by the poet Rudram kannanār, in praise of Karikāla. The king gave him 160 million gold coins as a present for the song. Pālai is the desert region. The city of Kāvērip-pattinam is introduced here in all its maritime glory. The poet here describes the greatness, the richness and the wonderful culture of the Chōla capital and state, and gives us a peep into the daily life of the people as it was lived two thousand years ago. The poem has a historical as well as a literary importance. Although the poet tries to give it an aham colouring, it is definitely a puram poem. We do not know anything about the author, who was certainly patronised by King Karikāla. The fourth poem of this collection was also written by him. His place is known as Kadiyalūr, but it has not been located.

10. Malaiṇpadukadām is also known as Kūttararruppadaṇ. Perum-Kausika has sung the poem in praise of Nanna. As the name signifies, the poem celebrates music, musical instruments and musicians. The particulars of musical instruments and details of the life of the hill tribes which we get here are not to be had elsewhere. A description of the path leading to the hill of Nanna makes interesting reading.

These poems constitute Pattup-pāṭṭu. A care-free life, an enjoyment of the good things thereof, love of nature, generosity and giving – all these are the keynote of the life of those days. The group has a wonderful commentary by the great writer Naccinārkiṇiyar. We do not know who gathered together these ten poems or who gave them the title Pattup-pāṭṭu. There are here separate poems on kurinji, mullai, neidaḷ and pālai, but not on marutam.

Such is the picture of Sangham poetry that we are able to gather. This poetry has about 2380 verses, long and short, said to be written by 473 poets. (There is many a repetition in the names of the poets, and, on a careful study of the texts some of them may be seen to be quite unnecessary) Kapilar has sung the largest number of verses. Excluding those five who have sung Aingurunuru (each has 100 verses to his credit here) we find that Avvai has sung quite a large number of verses – 59. The poets represent a cross section of society at all levels. We see the poets were all poor. Yet they had a very cordial relationship with the kings and the chiefs. Material goods were of the least count, fearlessness, an upright conduct, and service to humanity were considered the most valuable traits.

Perhaps it is as well we sound a note of caution here. The turn of the century had not known much of sangham poetry. Most of the sangham works had not then seen the light of print. And most of the modern scholars had not then come of age to study them. This study was undertaken by the young scholars who were just then coming of age. We should bear in mind the political and social climate at the time. Popular revolt against the British domination in the political and economic spheres, against social customs, against the system of education, against Sanskrit, and the like was mounting. People in India were just then studying radical and atheistic literature, in imitation of students in Britain, it was rather the fashion. In such a climate of scholarship and general unrest, the sangam poems and anthologies were being released one by one Pandits and scholars who had long been studying only such religion-oriented texts like Kamba Rāmāyanam, Periya-purānam, Kandapurānam, Villu Bhāratam, Tiruvilayādal and Asta prabandham, now had something new and unfamiliar, they avidly grabbed them From semi-religious literature to secular literature was indeed a welcome change Researches into the new found literature had now been going on for over half a century, exclusively, things have been analysed and dissected for long The Tamil people and their culture have grown through the centuries later also Literature and art have also unpredictably grown in all dimensions But having been at the subject of the sangham poetry for so long, naturally it is very hard for any one to part Research into the sangham poetry has been already overdone It is time creative and discerning minds turned to other poetry

References

- 1 The Pattup - pattu has been beautifully edited and published with the brilliant commentary of Naccinarkkiniyar by Dr Swaminatha Ayyar
- 2 Vide Kuruntohai verse 182

TIRUKKURAL

The perfection of Tamilian thought and its greatest contribution to world thought on all problems of life is agreed among all thinkers to be Tirukkural. It is universally acclaimed as the greatest Tamil classic. It has 'two aspects to its greatness – the most profound thought on the most baffling problems of existence and the most astounding economy of words and finish of style' ¹. Kural is the one book in Tamil about which thousands of pages have been written, both in Tamil and in English. But unfortunately, every thing about Kural is uncertain – the author, his place, his class in society, his religion, his age, his profession in life, and Vaiyapurī Pillai had taken elaborate pains to prove that the thoughts of Kural were adaptations of Sanskrit ². In this respect we may hazard a remark in a light vein that Kural is like God – everything about both is so uncertain! Whole volumes can be filled discussing these questions, but in the space of a few pages which we devote to the book here, we cannot even touch upon the vast magnitude of the writing on these points. However, we shall briefly mention all these points before proceeding to speak about the work.

THE AUTHOR

Jains used to say that the author was a Jain preceptor by name - Kunda kundācārya and that he was not Tiruvalluvar. Others have said that he was a friend of one merchant by name Ēlēlasinga. We have to dismiss all such stories as fiction, as fantastic myths. One legend says he was born in Mylapore, another says he took his book to the Tamil Sangham at Madurai to get its seal of approval. Both these do not ring true, and yet there is no improbability in them. The first legend says that he was a castaway child, of the lowest class in society. The term valluvar signifies a member of that community, a state public drummer. But a careful study of Kural not once but several times over, will give any one the feeling that the book could not have been written by one of the lowest class, however gifted or inspired he might be, and however deep his experience of life might be. A verse in the Tiruvalluvamālai even goes to the extent of saying that 'the ignorant would say that he was a member of the valluvar tribe but sensible persons would ignore the statement'³

Then the author's religion. Many writers including Vaiyapuri Pillai presume that the author is a Jain. The Jain way of life was one of total negation. An impartial orthodox writer like Dr Schweitzer points out that Kural does not preach world and life negation. If anything, Kural extolls the full enjoyment of life – a righteous life, for noble goals, through nobler means. It belies the very foundations of Jainism to say that a Jain could have written it. And again the Jain sect in the Tamil country was one which considered woman as a snare, a hindrance to spiritual advancement. The woman of Kural is the noblest of beings, an equal partner with man. Besides, in the third book of his Kural the author extolls life with woman so much that it is entirely out of place in any Jain scheme of things. It is a wonder how in the face all these, scholars had made bold to dub him a Jain. According to legend, the author was not an ascetic but a house-holder, who enjoyed the greatest domestic felicity with his wife Vāsuki, who was the sweetest flower of womanhood

He is said to have been a weaver by profession, according to legends he might have been a farmer, a king's counsellor – we do not know. His age is the most disputed question. We would avoid it, except by mentioning that he could not have existed during the period of the Kalabhra interregnum, 250 to 550 A D and therefore should have lived earlier (not later) and that this may perhaps be fixed as the last years of the sangham – about 200 A D. Vaiyapuri Pillai contends that Valluvar may be assigned to 600 A D, about the time of Appar.⁴ Pillai tries to unearth a Sanskrit source for all the thoughts of Valluvar and when the date of such Sanskrit sources goes up to 550 A D, his Valluvar comes later! Valluvar has a parallel in Manu, his polity has parallels in Kautilya and Kāmandaka, his medicine is taken from Āyurvedic works, even his sneezing is from the Kāmasūtra.¹⁵ Can it not be that some of these Sanskrit writers borrowed their thoughts from Kural? We refrain from entering into a lengthy discussion of the subject here. Kural may be later than Tolkāppiyam but certainly not later than 200 A D.

KURAL

After this lengthy, and to some extent unnecessary, discussion about the author, we shall now take up the contents proper of Kural. Kuraḷ means short, it is a variant of the venbā metre and has only two lines, having four and three feet in each line. The book takes its name from the metre. The kural venbā is not an easy type of metre, there is a specific arrangement in the linking of the feet of the verses (called ven-talai), which has to be scrupulously adhered to. Besides, there is a rhyme and alliteration, though the author does not very much adhere to these, he is generally particular to see that if the first word of both the lines in each couplet do not rhyme together, the first and the last words of the first line rhyme together. Besides, the kural venbā has an internal rhythm and cadence which are born not only out of the sound arrangement but also by the thought content. The author has achieved this in a full measure.

It is called Tiruk-Kural, Tiru (sacred) is a Tamil prefix added to express the people's high esteem of the work. It consists of three books and 133 chapters, with ten verses to each chapter. The first four chapters are a kind of preface, the first book, Arattuppāl has 38 chapters (including the preface), the second Porutpāl 70 chapters, and the third Kāmattuppāl, 25 chapters. The work may thus be seen to be arranged in the traditional manner of the first three goals of life. The fourth goal, liberation, has not been separately dealt with by the author. He seems to imply that one who leads a righteous life will eventually obtain release on the natural culmination of this life.

It is a great tribute to the author that all sects in the Tamil country claim him as their own,

The Śaivas, the Vaisnavas and the Jainas claim him as their own poet, since there are no buddhists here, we are not aware of their claim. Christians of the modern day claim him as their own. It need not cause us any surprise if all great thinkers claim him as their own to the end of time, because he went through life with a humble, pure and unbiased mind that was not clouded with current prejudices, because he stored the ripe and rich experience of all avenues of life in his heart and always gave expression to the to the mature wisdom that resulted from that experience, in the shortest and most artistic form. The poetry was not addressed to any external being but was merely an expression of an inward peace and joy. Even the greatest sorrows and tragedy leave behind a feeling of peace in the cultured mind, from peace joy is born, and only joy gives rise to the sweetest poetry.

Kural lays down a code of ethics which is universal and at the same time eternal. Time and space do not limit its concepts, whereas in Sanskrit, it is never universal, it is bound up with class (varna) and with exigency. In the poruṭpāl, he draws up an ideal code for rulers and administrators, this is based on what we would call a code of Gandhian Truth and Love (Non-violence). In this sense, it is unparalleled in the world lawbooks, not only in Sanskrit. No element of untruth or violence enters into the author's dictum here. This claim cannot be made of the Sanskrit Artha śāstras. Now going to the third part love, he speaks of love, a union of two souls which transcends the body. There is absolutely no element of vulgarity, physical love has never been exalted and any one can be allowed to study this part without the least hesitation that its thoughts may taint the young mind. The author might have known the Sanskrit books on the three subjects of aram, porul, and inbam, and probably that was the reason he had striven to write a classic on the three which could be much more ideal and lofty than the thoughts contained in the Sanskrit books and which could serve as a beacon light for all time and to all mankind. His concept of humanity, coming in the line of the poet who sang ‘yādum ūre yāvarum kēlir’ (all place is my place and all people are my kin) is one which embraces all climes and times. Hence, to say that he took anything from Sanskrit is not to recognise the dimensions of his writing, the like of which had never been written anywhere.

The first book deals with aram or dharma in general, the second with polity and administration, and the last book with the theme of love.

ARAM

The first chapter of the available book is an invocation to God. Here the writer does not refer to any particular god, but refers to Him only indirectly in involved terms. The directness, simplicity, elegance and force of the author’s general style is wholly absent here and this had made critics say, correctly perhaps, that this chapter is an interpolation or later addition, and not the author’s writing.

Tamilnad, from the beginning of time, had the two ways of life, the householder’s and the ascetic’s. Legends say that the author led the most happy householder’s life. But Kural extolls both equally

It seems to preach only monogamy, which implies a lofty status for woman. It does ask her to worship her spouse, but everywhere, her importance (as the orthodox phrase grahalaksmi implies) is emphasized. What is important is not the householder's or ascetic's life itself, but the goals of life and the manner in which they are followed.

Gandhi's philosophy of life was contained in the two words – Non-violence and Truth. Kural enunciates the same two in a single verse, in the same order: 'Non-killing (non-violence) is the supreme virtue. If you want a second one, follow truth (non-falsehood).'⁶ To Kural, as to Gandhi, righteousness is not a mere end – it is the means also, it is life. The author lived during a period of hand to mouth existence, but yet, he unequivocally advocated non-receiving. The present age of reason has well been anticipated by him. He enjoins man to test everything by his reason – whatever may be the subject, whoever may have said it.⁷ Rituals had been there in his day, but he transcends them all and pleads for a purity of the heart. Fate was then a much maligned term, he holds forth the hope that even fate can be beaten hollow by undaunted effort.⁸ Surely, the insistence on work and a confidence in its success is a gospel for all time. Kural lays great emphasis on education, not content with one chapter it devotes three chapters to this subject, besides one on eloquence.⁹

PORUL

The thoughts of Kural in the second book all deal with polity and administration. The author does not make any mention of any of the ruling dynasties in Tamilnad But we know that democracy was unknown in those days and the three crowned monarchs ruled the land Yet his dictum pronounced for the edification of kings holds good with equal force even in the days of a democratic republic It is not arms that secure victory for the state it is the just rule ¹⁰ Where the ruler demands money from the subjects, it is just highway robbery,¹¹ how meaningful today, in the second half of the 20th century, even on the very soil where the author wrote this dictum !

There should be the dread of punishment (for wrong doing) but severe punishment should not be inflicted.¹² The king should restrain his anger where he can expend it, certainly there is no point in restraining it where (as in the case of a superior power) it cannot be exercised ¹³ The chapters on time and place for the efforts of the king cannot be bettered There is also an interesting chapter on state intelligence ¹⁴ The chapters on valour and heroism can stand comparison with similar sangham poetry. There is also a chapter on what was once known as the 'fifth column' activity and sabotage.¹⁵

There is a chapter on medicine¹⁶ – its thoughts hold good, even under the greatest advances today in medical science

LOVE

Then we pass on to the third book on love themes The 25 chapters in this book have been distributed into the traditional two divisions, clandestine love and married love Although the author tries to follow the concepts of love in the sangham poetry, there is considerable departure from that tradition. Some of the verses are supreme love poetry, just penned down in four or five words — often a whole drama is enacted in these words. All the words are utterances of dramatic characters and hence their suggestion and artistic appeal is all the greater. Similar emotional expression we do not find even in the sangham poetry.

Kāmattuppāl, the third book, is sufficient to show that the author lived a most happy and felicitous domestic life.

It is remarkable that the author has written here a treatise on life in all its aspects — a charter for mankind which applies with equal force today, nearly twenty centuries after it was written, it bids fair to apply with the same force for many a century, till eternity. Its relevance is not only to Tamilnad, not only to the Hindu fold, but to the whole world, speaking various languages and following different faiths. Though the charter was made by a man, it applies with equal force to woman also. It lays bare the inmost recesses of the heart and that is the secret of its relevance. Born in a society ridden by caste, he speaks of a casteless classless society. Persons so distantly placed by language, climate and tradition as Gandhi, Tolstoy, Pope and Schweitzer, have hailed the Kural as a testament for mankind for all time.

How was the author able to pack so much eternal wisdom into the so few words of a verse? How was he able to write so many verses without in the least uncovering himself?

References

- 1 Jesudasan A History of Tamil Literature 1961, pages 42-3
- 2 Professor S Vayyapuri Pillai, History of Tamil Language and Literature 1956, pages 81-3
- 3 Verse 8 But yet Tiruvalluvamalai is a spurious work, it has no authority, vide my History of Tamil Literature, 11th Century, pages 34-56
- 4 Prof S Vayyapuri Pillai, History of Tamil Language and Literature pages 84-5
- 5 Ibid pages 82-3 6 Kural 323 7 Kural 355, 423
- 8 Kural 620 9 Ibid chapters 40-42, 65 10 Ibid verse 546
- 11 Ibid verse 552 12 Ibid verse 562 13 Ibid verse 301
- 14 Ibid chapter 59 15 Ibid chapter 89 16 Ibid chapter 95.

THE TWIN EPICS :
SILAPPADHIKĀRAM
AND MANIMĒKHALAI

This is a novel term invented in the second quarter of this century to denote Silappadhikāram and Manimēkhalai. We shall do well to remember that the two are not epics and are not twins. We reserve this term to the end

SILAPPADHIKĀRAM

Silappadhikāram, the story of the anklet, is hailed as the first epic poem in the Tamil language. It is in the āsīriyam metre, the metre in which most of the sangham poetry was written. The occurrence of the story is placed in the three cities Puhār (Kāvērip-pattinam), Madurai and Vanjī, which were the capitals of the Chōlas, the Pāndiyas and the Sēras. Accordingly it is divided into the three respective cantos. Kannakī, the daughter of a rich merchant in Puhār is married to Kōvalan, the son of another rich merchant there, the story of these two is Silappadhikāram.

Kōvalan is enchanted by the dance of a young dancing girl, Mādhavī, in the king's court and forsaking Kannakī, he lives with Mādhavī. The two are very much attached to each other. A girl is born to them. There is the national festival called Indira vilā.

The two move to the beach in the course of the festivities and there they sing love-songs to the accompaniment of the yāl. From Mādhavi's song, Kōvalan suspects quite wrongly of course that she is in love with another, and deserting her, he returns to Kannakī. He had till that day spent all his wealth and all the jewels of Kannakī in the pursuit of pleasure with Mādhavi. Kannakī, as the dutiful Hindu wife that she really was, offers him her anklets, which were the only trinkets now left with her. Kōvalan, who is now wholly crest-fallen, proposes to sell them in Madurai and engage in business there so that he may again acquire riches. So, taking Kannakī with him, he marches out of the city at night. On the way, they are befriended by Kauntī adigaḷ, a Jain nun, who acts as a sort of chaperon for Kannakī.

The Madurai part of the story then begins. Kauntī leaves them both in the care of a woman of the cowherd's class, as 'that was the one class which knew no evil'. Kannakī prepares his food and serves him. An earlier dream makes Kōvalan very uneasy. He leaves for the city bazaar to sell one anklet. He is met by a goldsmith who had stolen the queen's anklet. Planning to foist his theft on innocent Kōvalan, the goldsmith seeks the king's presence. The king is just then irked by the sulking queen, who is angry that he evinced undue interest in the dance of a danceuse in the royal court just then. When the jeweller tells him of the stolen anklet, the king intending to say, 'bring him to be killed', actually said, 'kill him and bring the anklet here,' out of an apparent anxiety to please his the queen. The words of the jeweller could not convince the executioners that Kōvalan was a thief, but one among them, a hasty drunkard, fells Kōvalan with a sweep of his sword. (Theft was punished with beheading in those days.) The news spreads fast and, in the cowherds' quarters, they see many ill omens. The news reaches them. Kannakī rushes to the court to prove her husband's innocence. As she goes along the city streets crying and challenging, the Sun god replies "Your husband is no thief; fire will consume this city which called him a thief." She sees the lifeless body of Kōvalan. The body comes to life. Kovalan embraces her and leaving her there, departs to a celestial abode. She meets the king, accuses him of unjustly killing her husband, and shows him her other anklet. The Pāndiya is famous as the producer of pearls. His queen's anklet would naturally have encased a pearl in its core but Kannakī's anklet contained a ruby. Seeing it, the king realises his injustice and instantly gives up his life. The queen follows Kannakī, not yet appeased, plucks her left breast and throws it at the city. The god of fire appears and at her command consumes the city. She leaves the city, goes west, and from the top of a hill in the Kongu country, she ascends to the celestial regions.

The happenings in the Sēra land form the third part. The hill tribes who witness her ascent to the heavens from their hill, report it to the Sēra King, Senkuttuvan. Induced by his queen, he plans to install an image of Kannakī for worship and so takes out an expedition to the Himalayas to bring a stone for carving out the image. Vanquishing two princes in the north who jeered at the Tamils, he brings the stone on their heads. When the temple is consecrated, a vision of Kannaki appears. She is now fully-appeased. Many princes go there to worship her, including Gajabāhu from Ceylon.

Ilangō Adigal, brother of Sēran Senkuttuvan, was with him when the hill people narrated the ascension of Kannaki to the heavens and when the poet Sāttan, who was present, narrated to them her full story. He requested Ilangō to write her story in the form of an epic, suited to the three ruling houses, saying that he himself had already written the story of the daughter of Mādhavi. Thereupon Ilangō wrote this poem to illustrate three truths.

The poem as we have it today consists of three books and thirty chapters. The metre employed is the āsuriyam, but throughout the book we have many musical pieces written in different metres. They form an important part of the book also. The dance of Mādhavi which is the origin of the entire story has been elaborated by the author to such an extent that the poem itself has come to be called a dramatic epic. Later, musical pieces are introduced in the poem as songs sung by the hunters, the cowherds and the hill tribes, other songs are the song of the ball game, the pestle, the swing and so on. Naturally these lead us to conclude that the author took the motifs for these from the folk-songs current in his time at various levels.

Śilappadhikāram is a tragedy which reaches its climax with the burning of the city of Madurai by Kannaki. But the Indian tradition of art and letters would not consider tragedy as the end of any art and so the story in the third part was invented and probably added on much later, bringing together many popular stories, and some fact and more fiction. The author is never mentioned in the first two books but the third gives his biography and makes him a contemporary of Sāttan, who is said to be a personal witness of some of the happenings in the story. With the addition of the Vaṇṇik kāṇḍam, what was mere fiction has been sought to be made into history, and Kannakī is made into a historical figure. Many tutelary deities are worshipped in different parts of the Tamiḷnad in different names such as Mārī, Draupadī, Sellī etc., and these are all now sought to be identified with Kannakī and the Kannakī cult, a new cult based on this fiction, is taking shape. Passions have been aroused and Kannakī is hailed as the flower of the Dravidian culture. The spirit of Ilaṅgō would certainly turn in its grave if it were to know how its heroine is being distorted and glorified as a god.

But, the question of age, the Pattinī cult and the historicity of Kannakī apart, the poem is a grand poem. The three books, Kural, Silappadhikāram and Kamba Rāmāyaṇam are considered to be choicest products of the Tamiḷ Muse¹ and deservedly so. The author bestows generous praise on the Chōḷa and the Pāṇḍiya (and on the Sēra in the third part) and in this sense it is an epic for the three ruling dynasties of Tamiḷnad. It is the only book extant dealing with the three divisions of Tamiḷ - yaḷ, īṣai and nāṭakam. It deals with all the regions dealt with in Tamiḷ grammar and speaks at length of people in all classes of society. No other work brings out the joys and aspirations of the lower classes as vividly as this epic.

The fact that its heroine and hero are taken not from royalty, but from the common people, is significant. Another feature is the reverence shown by the author to all systems of religion. He speaks of Śiva, of Muruga, of Viṣṇu, of Śakti, and of Arha as though he is an ardent devotee of each particular god. His devotion transcends clannishness. Such catholicity is rare in later literature. Manimēkhalai, said to be also an epic and a sequel to this book, is in sharp contrast to Silappadhikāram in this respect. Its author speaks like an intolerant bigot in decrying other religions, particularly Jainism. As already noted, Silappadhikāram is unique, as perhaps the only tragedy in Tamil literary history.

The poem quotes Kural and so its age can be only later than Kural. One point is that it could not have been composed during the Kalabhra period, that is between 250 to 600 A.D. Probably we may assign the period about 200 to 250 A.D. as the date for the main Silappadhikāram text, and the period 575 to 600 as the period when the later interpolations such as the third book were added.

MANIMEKHALAI

Manimēkhalai is considered to be an epic also and a sequel to Silappadhikāram. Manimēkhalai was the daughter of Mādhavi and Kōvalan. When he was unjustly killed, she resolved that her own daughter should no more take part in dances. But her own mother felt that it was not proper for a dancer to abandon her profession, and so helped Udayakumara, the prince of the land, to court her. Manimēkhalai on the other hand would follow her own mother's advice and would have nothing to do with him. When he importunes her, her guardian angel, Manimēkhalai after whom she was herself named, lifts her up by air to a distant place, endows her with some super human powers and causes her to come by a magic bowl which, when filled by the hand of a chaste lady, would go on issuing food eternally. There is a famine in the land which she helps to relieve with her bowl. To avoid the attentions of the prince again, she takes on the guise of a well known woman there, whose husband coming on the scene, finds the prince pursuing her, and thinking it is his wife, kills him. The prince's mother gets angry with Manimēkhalai and tries to harm her in several ways, but she always escapes. She then learns the various schools of philosophy. While thus engaged she learns that the city of Kāvērippattinam, capital of the Chōlas and her mother's place, was washed away by the sea. She then goes to Kāncīpuram. Aravana Adīgal, an enlightened Buddhist seer and saint, teaches her the Buddhist philosophy. She then performs tapas (or penance) to end all future births.

The story of Manimēkhalai is all a jumble, there is no plot, no hero and she is herself a very poor heroine. The only purpose of the poem is to propagate the Buddhist religion and philosophy. In this the author has achieved a certain amount of success. In this aspect, namely that of religious disputation, this poem is the fore-runner of many such later writing. Chapters 27 and 29 of the book, dealing with the heroine's learning the other religions and the Buddhist religion, are a mine of information on Buddhist logic and philosophy, which are not to be found elsewhere in the Tamil language.

The book is, like Silappadhikāram, in the āsiriyam metre and contains the same number of thirty chapters (over 4800 lines) There the similarity ends This book does not deal with mut-Tamīl, it does not deal with the three ruling kingdoms, it does not speak about the need for the king to uphold a just rule, nor about the homage of the great to the chaste woman It speaks no doubt of karma and how it will bear fruit in subsequent births It refers to more than a score of purāṇic legends It does not employ any other metre anywhere, except the āsiriyam, it does not have musical pieces, it does not pay homage to other gods and deities as Silappadhikāram ungrudgingly does But where it praises the Buddha, we have some good lyrical poetry

Though Manimēkhalai refutes nine schools of thought, its chief target for attack is the Jain school The author is very intolerant in ridiculing the Jain religion ²

Sāttan is said to be the author of his poem, the epithets Kūlavānikan (trader in groceries) and Sittalai are two epithets generally employed to qualify the name Sattan But Silappadhikāram does not mention Sittalai, it merely says 'the Tamil teacher Sāttan' Sāttan always signifies Śastā, one of the village tutelary deities. The Vanjik-kāṇḍam of Silappadhikāram says that Senkuttuvan and Ilangō learnt the story of Kannaki from the lips of Sāttanar, who said he had already sung the story of Manimēkhalai taking the holy orders Chapter 26 of the poem speaks of Senkuttuvan's expedition to the Himalayas to get the proper stone for making Kannaki's image Obviously, it could not be that Sāttan narrated this in his story, even before Senkuttuvan had heard of Kannaki or had ever marched north Hence the statement that Sāttan told the story of Kannaki to the brothers at Vanji and also that he had already sung about the renunciation of Manimēkhalai are a mere myth

As noted earlier, this poem makes good poetry in places, but is hardly conceivable as an epic as we understand it Though it has no story interest, the fact remains that it is woven round the wanderings of a woman The Kalabhras, invaders of Madurai from an alien land, held sway there for three centuries, the third to the sixth A. D They were of the Digambara Jain sect which suppressed women, music and all worldly pleasures Generally poetry in praise of women could not have been written during that period History tells us that Pāndiya Kadumkōn put to route the Kalabhras and rescued the land from them ³ This was in A. D. 575 Manimēkhalai could have been composed only after this date, that is by about 600 A. D. Perhaps the third book of Silappadhikarām, the Vanjikkāṇḍam, was also added on at about the same time

It will be clear from what has been said here that Manimēkhalai is no epic, and considering the lapse of three centuries between the two poems, they cannot be called twin epics

References

- 1 Bharati mentions only these three books in his song Sen Tamil Nadu verses 6-7
- 2 Manimekhalai chapter 26, lines 108-201
- 3 Vide the Velvikkudi grant of Parantakan Neduncadayan, Peruntoḥai 889

THE EIGHTEEN KILK – KANAKKU

Minor poems in the venbā metre had come to be written during the immediate post-sangham period; these are now generally known as the Eighteen Kīlk-kanakku, the poems were written mostly during the different years between the limits 250 A. D. and 700 A. D. The grouping of the 18 under the term kīlk-kanakku was done at a much later date. We give below a list of the eighteen, grouped according to their subject matter.

On the subject of ethics 11 books Tirukkural, Nānmanikkadigai, Tirukadugam, Sirupancamūlam, Ēlādi, Innā nārpatu, Inya nārpatu, Nāladi, Palamoli nānuru, Mudu molik-kāṇṇi and Ācārarak-kōvai

On the subject of aham 6 books Aintinai aimbatu, Aintinai elupatu, Tinaimoli Aimbatu, Tinaimalai nūrraimpatu, Kaṇṇilai and Kār nārpatu

On the subject of puram one book. Kalavali nārpatu

We observe that the major portion of the eighteen books deals with ethics, they are called kīl because they were supposed to deal with basic ethics – code of conduct, basic for human social living (kīl - base). We do not think the term kīl was used to denote that they all had only a few lines to the verse, each being a venba.

During the early part of the 20th century, many considered the Kīlk-kanakku poems also to be the works of the sangham age, but it is now acknowledged that they are of a much later date, although the names of some authors, and the treatment of some aham themes, remind us of the sangham poetry. Unlike that poetry which is mostly in the āsīriyam metre (except Kalittōhai and Paripādal which are in the kalī and the paripādal metres respectively), the Kīlk-kanakku is in the venbā (except the Mudu-molikkāṇṇi which is so to speak in single lines). The Eight Anthologies (Ettut-tohai) are collections of poems by many poets, while the Kīlk-kanakku is each the work of a single author; there is no compiler here.

Now we shall proceed to examine the works in brief. Tirukkural is in the kurāl venbā metre (a variant of the venbā). It has been discussed earlier in a separate chapter (page 73). It may not fall within the general period here assigned – A D 250 to 700, but may belong to a little earlier period, perhaps the end of what we call the Sangham age. All the other ten books on ethics are being discussed in a separate chapter on the evolution of the ethical literature in the Tamil language. Of the ten, the Ācāra-kōvai indicates a considerable amount of religious bias; it might have been composed after the Śaiva Nāyanmārs had toured the Tamil country and had sung their devotional songs. Its date may be fixed as about 750 A. D. and so it also falls outside the period fixed for the other books.

Taking up the books falling under the group aham, we find that even the title of each book defines the number of verses in it This is a strange feature, found also in the Kalavali of the last group Gloss writers have always referred to Kalittohai and Paripādal as Kali 150 and Paripādal 70, even in the first group here, we have Nāladi 400 and Palamoli 400 and Innā and Inyā, 40 each Other books mentioned by number are Aham 400 and Puram 400 and the short 500, Ainkuru nūru

Of the six here, the first five came to be known only very late, they are referred to as the five Aintinai and we find a historian of the 19th century, unaware of the existence of these separate works, presumed that they were the Kurinji-tinai, Mullai-tinai, Maruta-tinai, Neital-tinai and Pālai-tinai !

Aintinai 50 deals with the five conventional regional themes of kurinji etc, with ten verses to each tinai Its eulogistic verse says that men who do not know the poem may not know the sweetness of the Tamil language. Aintinai 70 has in like manner 14 verses to a tinai This is superior to the previous book in respect of language and style Tinaimoli 50 has ten verses to the tinai and is written in a good style. Tinai mālai 150 is perhaps on the model of Kalittohai It contains 153 verses, at the rate of 30 or 31 verses to each tinai Its author is the one who wrote Ēlādi. Since the size of this poem is much larger than the other two, many interesting passages and references are found here Some new words used in this work help us to fix its date as the first half of the 7th century. Kaṇṇilai, of 60 verses, is available only in fragments Its title might have been Aintinai 60, in uniformity with the first two here mentioned.

Considering the five books together, we find that they all sing of the conventional aham themes of the poems of the sangham age. we find a certain amount of constraint and impeded flow in these works. All of them no doubt treat of pre-marital love but their treatment is generally conventional. This is because of the artificial arrangement of a particular number of verses for each tīnai and perhaps because of the venbā metre which gives a feeling of stiffness and affectation, against the free flow and artistic ease of the āsīryam metre of the poems like Kuruntohai, Narṇīnai and Aha nānūru. This leads us to believe that the literary conventions had died out and social customs had so changed that these authors find it difficult to recapture the spirit of a past age. Or, are they mere literary compositions of less gifted writers trying to follow on the model of a glorious past? Or some thing like a school composition exercise?

*Kār-nāṛpatu*¹ is a poem of forty verses all dealing with the literary conventions associated with kār, the rainy season, the tīnai set apart for the purpose is the forest region, the subject matter is the-love sick maid who is staying at home, awaiting the return of her husband, the hero, at the appointed time, namely the the advent of the rains. She is despondent, as there is no sign of his return. The verses are in the nature of the maid's comrade consoling her that her lover will soon arrive. Though there are some good verses, monotony could not be avoided.

Kaḷavalī nāṛpatu the last book to be noticed, belongs to the group puram, from the point of view of its date, it has taxed the brains of all scholars to the utmost. It deals with a real battle and describes in all its 40 verses a real battle field, perhaps the only poem of its kind in the language. The traditional belief is that the poet Poihai sang it in order to please Kō-cengat-chōla, who took prisoner Sēramān Kanaikkāl Irumporai in a pitched battle at a place called Pōr, and in order thereby to secure the release of the Sēramān who was a friend of the poet. All the verses end with the words, 'in the battle-field where the Chōla defeated his foe'. Though the resulting monotony could not be avoided, the poem has considerable merits to recommend it. Unlike the subjects in earlier puram poems, which always speak of the virtue of giving and similar ethical topics, this poem as pointed out deals with a pitched battle and in that sense is unique. There is considerable difference of opinion regarding the author, the victorious Chōla and the vanquished Sēra, and their date. The author is not the Poihaiyār of the sangham age nor the Poihaiyār of the Vaisnava canon. The victor Kō-cengat-chōla is also a canonised saint, believed to have lived in the 5th century A. D. There seems to be some confusion in the name of the vanquished Sēra.

Reference

- 1 Kar-ettu, or eight verses on the advent of the kar season is a short poem in the Saiva canon, 11th book, on a similar theme

EPIC LITERATURE

Hero worship has been an important trait of human nature throughout the centuries, among all the nations of the world. This trait has manifested itself in literature as the epic. Every nation has its own heroes and they are also the greatest characters in their epics. The epic literature thus deals with the basic aspirations and ideals of the nation as portrayed in the lives of their heroes in life and legend. In spite of all racial feelings whipped up to a frenzied pitch by political agitators, it is not wrong to say that the stories of Rama and Krishna have continued to be national treasures from a hoary past. The fragmentary references to their stories and to the translations of the Rāmāyāna and the Mahābhārata found in Tamil literature and in inscriptions bear ample testimony to this. But somehow the first attempts at this kind of Tamil epic writing is lost to us today.

Yet we have a very wide range of epic literature from the beginnings of Tamil literary history down to the 16th century. Later grammatical treatises define the content and composition of various types of literature. In the book on rhetoric by Dandi, we have the first definition of an epic, a perum-kāppiyam. Almost all the great epics in the Tamil language had been written before the days of Dandi. His definition had naturally been drawn from those epics, he had also freely utilised ideas from Sanskrit literature.

THE EARLY EPICS

No single standard can be applied to all the Tamil epics. Often we find critics trained in western concepts and methods of literary criticism applying their own yardsticks to measure the worth or standard of the epics. It is good to know the western standards and methods but it is wrong to apply them as they are to our epics and pronounce a judgement on them. Each epic poem should be evaluated not by any external standard but only by the author's own aim and purpose in writing it. Each has a different aim and the real critic's evaluation is valid only if it assesses how far this aim has been attained.

The grouping of the Tamil epics as the major five and the minor five is all a myth. It has no validity, from the point of view of the content of the epic poems or of history. The so-called major epics are not sangham poetry. They belong to a much later age.

Silappadhikāram is the first Tamil epic we have today. The story revolves round the anklet of Kannaki in trying to sell which, her husband was ordered to be killed by the Pāndiya prince, on a charge of theft. When she came to know how he was killed, she flew into a righteous fury, proved her husband's innocence to the prince, burnt his city of Madurai and later became one of the celestials. The epic has a great heroine but no hero. The story is very simple and has absolutely no involvement. Just because Prince Senkuttuvan was introduced into the story in the third book of the epic, which is in the nature of a later addition, Tamil lovers fondly contend that the whole story is a historical narrative, forgetting that the epic was conceived by the poet with a definite purpose and is purely an imaginative romantic tragedy. Ilango, the author, was a great poet well versed in Tamil letters, music and drama, and he seems to have invented the story of Kannaki to bring into play therein these three divisions of Tamil poetry. He has marvellously succeeded in his aim and today the only book which treats of these three divisions of Tamil is his book and no other. The prologue says that he wrote the book to uphold three truths – that dharma will destroy one who swerves from a just rule, that the great will always celebrate the chastity of woman, and that karma will adduce the fruits of one's action. The author has eminently succeeded in this also. Incidentally, he has also sung the greatness of the ruling dynasties in the Tamilnad of his days and in a sense preached tolerance and respect towards the other religions. These are the main ingredients of his story and the purpose of his writing. It will be puerile to look for other things in his poem – such as character delineation and similar aspects which are considered important in western literary criticism.

Manimēkhalai, said to be a sequel to Silappadhikāram, can in no way claim to be an epic. It is the story of a young woman, who declined to fall into the snares of love because of the tragic story of her mother's love. She made a detailed investigation of the doctrines of various religious sects and ultimately entered the holy orders of Buddhism. Its only importance lies in its antiquity and in the fact that it is the only Buddhist work extant.

Perum kathai is the next important book. It was rescued from total extinction by Dr. Swaminatha Ayyar and published as a handsome volume, although its opening and concluding chapters are missing. It is the story of Prince Udayanan, his many love affairs, the affairs of his son, and his ultimate renunciation. The plot in this epic is not closely knit, because of the narrative which is a mere jumble of war, love, marriage and jealousy and so on. There is no pronounced Jain propaganda here as Buddhism is in Manimēkhalai. But Perum kathai (the great story) is important to Tamil literary history for its descriptions of the life of the Tamilians at the regal level - palaces, their glory and splendour, their arts, music and dance, their games, craftsmanship and other skills. The author, Kongu vēlir, lived in a corner of the Tamil country, far removed from the main stream of Tamil culture and civilization. Probably he had an occasion to tour the Tamīlnad and what he witnessed there - the luxury of the people, their day to day life, the glories of their nobility, men and women, their play and pastimes, the beauty of their womanhood, and their joys and pleasures in life - made such an indelible impression on him that, perhaps to eulogise this glory of life, he embarked on the task of writing the epic.

The next two important works are Jīvaka cintāmani and Cūlāmani, both Jain works. Except for occasional flashes of poetry, there is neither plot nor character in them. They are one long series of adventure, amour and fighting, culminating in the Jain way of renunciation.

KAMBAR AND SEKKILAR

Midway between the two in point of time comes the Rāmāyana of Kambar. Though the main story of Rama is taken from the Sanskrit work of Vālmiki, this is a great work by its own right, easily the greatest writing the Tamil muse has produced. 'Kamba Rāmāyanam is hardly an epic. It is an entire literature in itself' says one critic. For mere vastness of its size, for delineation of character, for real dramatic situations deftly handled, for the greatest felicity of expression, for humour light as well as grim, pathos, in fact all the finer emotions of the human heart, and for the expression of the finest sentiments, said to be nine in Tamil and Sanskrit rhetoric, and for unequivocally upholding the noblest human values, there is no writer even to approach the eminence of Kambar. The canons of western literary criticism can be applied to this epic with advantage and the epic itself will open up new dimensions to the principles of epic criticism.

After Kambar, we may refer to two more works on the epic scale. The first is Periya purānam, having over 4200 verses, dealing with the lives of the Śaiva saints and the visitation of God's grace on them. We need not look at this writing from the epic angle, but looked at from the angle of love of God, bhakti, this classic is unequalled in the wide range of Tamil literature. Both legend and history play a great part in Sēkkilār's handling of the incidents in the various stories but they are all strung together with the single thread of bhakti—devotion and self-effacement in the service of God. Similar hagiology may not be easily found on the lives of the saints of the world. Here he combines poetry with biography and the result is a adorable literary classic. Throughout the entire book, Sēkkilār the author is concerned with the love of man and the beauty of the soul. There is no monotony in the narration—each story has a different approach to the spirit of service and devotion. We have here people from all levels in society of both the sexes, crowned kings and outcaste untouchables, gifted singers of the Śaiva canon, and even a devotee from an alien sect. Many modern concepts of social reform such as the emancipation of women, removal of caste barriers, upliftment of the down-trodden, the joy of giving and the dignity of labour seem to have been anticipated by him and handled with considerable dexterity and depth, and solutions to the problems offered. Even gruesome tales open up the inmost recesses of the heart where we see God enshrined. He has laid down a spiritual democracy of love and sacrifice, which it will be difficult to emulate.

OTHER BOOKS

Kanda purāṇam of Kacciyaṇṇa is another important work. It seeks to deal with the exploits of Lord Muruga and identify him as the Supreme Being. Incidentally he has woven many doctrines of the Śaiva Siddhanta philosophy into the work. It runs to over ten thousand verses in length and the whole story is reminiscent of Kamba Rāmāyaṇam, from which he has drawn largely for characters, thoughts and situations, and language. It is indeed very popular among the Śaivas and constitutes their store house for religious discourses,

Of minor importance in narrative writing, though not on the epic scale, are the Bhāratam of Villiputtūrar, and the story of Nala done by Puhālēndi and by Prince Ativīrarāma. Puhālēndi is the earliest of these in point of time and his Nalavenbā, a short poem of 424 venbās is easily the most widely read poem, read by students who are just being introduced to Tamil classical poetry, it is also equally popular. The poem has an easy flow and grace of movement. The later venbā acquired such perfection at his hands that he is proverbially hailed as the master of it. Within its limited scope, the poem is descriptive and equally emotional. The author narrates his story in a sweet manner and the praise bestowed on him is quite deserved. Ativīrarāma Pāndiyan attempted the same story on a grand scale three centuries later, he began his work with the proportions of a large epic but finished it abruptly even before he was through with a third part of the story. There are indeed some pieces of good poetry but the whole poem is a failure, even as a limited narrative writing. It is however widely read by scholars of the old school for its erotic tone and partly on account of the proverbial saying, 'Nar datam is a tonic for poets', which however was meant to apply only to the original Sanskrit work of Harsa, of which this is an adaptation.

Villu Bhāratam, a work of about 4300 verses is still immensely popular, and there are many who can reel off hundreds of its verses from memory. The Mahābhārata story has a universal appeal and it is here reflected in this book, among those who do not know Sanskrit. The chief attraction of Villu is the mechanical rhythm in which his verses are composed. In some dramatic situations, he is able to tell his tale in an arresting manner, but he is not able to rise to the highest reaches of poetry and fathom the subtle and inmost recesses of the heart like Kambar

Like the story of Nala which is just an episode in the Mahābhārata, the story of Hariscandra and of Purūravas, also similar episodes, have been done in Tamil verse. Some scenes from the Hariscandra purāna are still very popular among even the unlettered, but the story of Purūravas, done equally well, has not seen the light of print in separate book form, and so is unknown to the student of Tamil. Kādambarī, metrical translation from Sanskrit is a large work but is equally unknown to scholars. Raghuvamśa of Kalidāsa done into 1000 verses by Arasakēsari, a poet of Ceylon, is also a long narrative poem.

Two more works conceived on the epic scale deserve consideration here. One is Prabhōda candrō-dayam, of over 2000 verses, written by a local chief, Tiruvēnkatanāthar of Mātai, he was a patron of Vaidyanātha deśika of Ilakkana vilakkam fame. The long poem speaks of the rise of the moon, namely Supreme Knowledge, after subduing darker forces; it is wholly allegorical and though a large number of average scholars avidly read it sometime ago, it never had any wide popularity. It is an advaitic work. The other work by the well known Sivaprakāśa svāmi, a gifted writer of the 17th century, is Prabhu-linga-līlai, of over 1000 verses, translated from the Kanarese. It is a Vīra Śaiva treatise dealing with the life of Allamā-prabhu, who is Śiva Himself, and his exploits on earth Svāmī was a good versifier and the book had been once very popular with scholars who delighted largely in figures of speech. We can admire here the fertile imagination of the author but it has no story or plot interest, being unalloyed allegory.

Much nearer our own times is Kucēlōpākyaṇam, in about 800 verses, an episode from the Bhāgavata, done in the classic epic style, said to be written by Devarāja pillai of Vallūr in mid-19th century. It is a small story and greatly popular even today, being written in elegant simple viruttam metre. It is on the same level as Nala venbā and is sure to have always a limited popularity.

The modern age for speed and a fast living, a living for the moment, without knowing or caring for eternal values, is hardly the climate for epic literary production at any time in the near future.

Reference

- 1 A poem of the early 19th century names the five major epics for the first time. Damodaram pillai coined the term minor epics in his introduction to his edition of culamanī 1889.

THE JAINA EPICS

In the history of Tamil Epic writing of the first twelve centuries after Christ, the epics written by the Jains occupy a prominent place. They are four in number and they are Perum kathai, Jīvaka Cintāmani, Cūlāmani and Nīlakēṣi. We shall discuss here the salient features of these

PERUM KATHAI

Unlike the other three, Perum kathai is not a Jain epic, although it is written by a Jain author. The author is Konguvēl of the Kongu country. Perum kathai simply means the Great Story, its Sanskrit counterpart is Brhat-katha (also a Great Story) written by the Ganga chief Durvinita, of the 7th century. Konguvēl adapted his text from this source, probably a century later. This epic does not employ the viruttam metre used by the later Jain epics, but is written in the āsiriyappā, the metre employed by the earlier Tamil epics, Silappadhikāram and Manimēkhalai. The book is divided into six cantos and is a very ambitious work, but the introductory and the concluding portions of it are not available. It is indeed a classical poem cited by all commentary writers and was universally acknowledged as a great poem. As the story is generally unfamiliar, we shall give it briefly here, Udayanan King of Kausāmbi is made prisoner by Emperor Prachōdana. While in prison, he teaches the Emperor's daughter, Vāsavadattai to play on the yāl. With the help of his own minister Yūhi and a gifted state elephant which attaches itself to him because of his superior instrumental music, he manages to elope with her and in due time marries her. Finding that Udayanan neglects his duties to the state in his enjoyment of the felicities of married life, the clever Yūhi causes a fire in which Udayanan is made to believe that Vasavadattai has died. Next, he falls in love with the Princess Padumai in a neighbouring state and marries her. Then Vasavadattai is restored to him. He watches a tournament of balls between his queens and there falls in love with a good player who is an attendant of Vāsavadattai. This attendant is then seen to be the princess of another state and he marries her. He then marries Virisihai, daughter of a hermit, to whom he had made floral gifts when she was a little girl. Similar stories of adventure and love follow regarding Naravāhanadatta, son of Udayanan. He marries Madana manjikai, Vēhavati and so on. Finally Udayanan realises the emptiness of all life and with his wives takes to penance.

Perum kathai is an extraordinarily good piece of descriptive poem, it describes thousands of the good things of life very vividly and luxuriantly. Apart from adventure and love-making, there is nothing in it to justify its being called an epic or great poetry. The language is attractive and glamorous but the character portrayal is absent and treatment of human emotions and values is very poor. It no doubt makes interesting reading but is nothing more.

CINTAMANI

Jīvaka cintāmani, by the Jain monk Tīru - Takka devar is in the viruttam metre, running to 3150 verses. It is a true Jain work in this that it preaches the Jain way of austerity in life. But the story and the author's narration of it are anything but austere. We shall first give here in brief the story of the poem.

Saccanda, ruler of the kingdom of Ēmāṅgada, gave himself up to the enjoyment of wordly pleasures, along with his newly wedded queen Vijaya, handing over the administration of the state to his minister Kattiyankāra. The minister gradually built up his power and one day raided the king's palace. Expecting such a manoeuvre, the king had caused a flying machine to be built, on which he now sent away his queen who was then in an advanced state of pregnancy. In the fighting the king died. The queen landed on a cremation ground where a son was born to her and was called Jīvaka. He was brought up by a merchant of the city. In due time, the boy grew up and learned from his teacher his real parentage. The herds of cattle of the local chief of cowherds were driven away by hunters from the hills. No one was able to rescue the herds from them. Jīvaka fought with the hunters and brought back the herds. The chief gave away his daughter in marriage to Jīvaka the victor, but Jīvaka, because he was of a different caste, accepted her in marriage on behalf of his comrade Padumukhan, who was of the cowherd's clan. Thus begin the marriage adventures of Jīvaka. Next, he defeated Gāndarvādatta, a princess from the celestial world in a musical contest and married her, much to the chagrin of Kattiyankāra. Two girls Gunamālai and Suramanjari entered into a contest of making toilet powder, and appointed Jivaka as the judge. He adjudged that of Gunamālai as the superior one. Enraged, Suramanjari shut herself up in a convent, vowing that she would make him go to her. The state elephant in a mad fury attacked Gunamālai and he rescued her and now married her. As he was then in trouble with Kattiyankāra, Sudanjana deva, who owed his liberation from a dog's birth to the uttering of mantras by Jivaka, took him away from the city by air. Another princess Padma was bitten by a snake, he removed the snake poison and married her. In another place Kēmasari, daughter of a merchant, was long without a marriage, the astrologer had said that she would marry the person on seeing whom she would show signs of shyness. She felt shy on seeing Jivaka and so she married him. Going to another place, he taught archery to the princes of the land and married their sister Kanakamālai. Then he met for the first time his mother, who parted from him at his birth. In another place girls were engaged in a ball game and Vimalai, the daughter of a rich merchant of the place, running after the ball saw him and fell in love with him. He went to a shop, which happened to be that merchant's shop and sat there. Immediately all merchandise, which was heaped up there unsold for long, was sold away. As this was in keeping with the words of a sooth-sayer, she was given to him in marriage. Then he enticed Suramanjari with his music and married her. Next he went to a tryst organised by his uncle Govindan, King of Vīdēha, to the effect that he who shot an arrow at a rotating target could marry his daughter Ilakkanai. Jivaka shot the target and won her hand, but Kattiyankāra was enraged at his appearance there and in the fight that ensued Jivaka killed him and married Ilakkanai. Next he ascended the throne with his eight wives. After some time he realised the transience of all worldly things and, making his son king, renounced the world and after due penance attained the ultimate blissful state.

Cintāmanī is so called because it is said one may get satisfaction in this book in all fields that he can think of (Cintāmanī - gem which grants one's wishes.) It is also called the Mana-nūl (book of marriages), which seems fully justified from the love adventures of the hero. The austerity of life that should be the predominant note of Jain literature is prominent by its absence in this book. The work is a very ambitious one, but its chief note is sensuousness. 'The book is a fine pastime for the luxuriously inclined and it gives terribly dangerous stimulation to the senses. If there is one book in Tamil literature that should be banned for the young, it is the Cintāmanī. The crime that Tīru-Takka devaṛ has committed against society is the real source of its popularity.'¹

Cintāmanī has an important place in the history of Tamil literature in this that it is probably the first book to employ the viruttam metre in a long continuous narrative. This metre had been employed to great effect by the Vaiṣṇava and the Śaiva canon writers of the 7th to the 9th centuries, but it is extremely unlikely that the Jain monks who mostly lived a cloistered life in those days (9th century) could have known the hymns. Hence the attempt of Devar may be taken as his own innovation based on the kalippa and the musical pieces in Silappadhikāram. His attempt was a marvellous success, so far as he was concerned, although it is crude and unpolished. But perfection in the metre was attained by Kambar who was his contemporary, because he had studied both the Śaiva and the Vaiṣṇava canons very well. There may be many happy turns of expression, picturesque language, realistic and arresting description, in Cintamani, but the book falls short of being great poetry. There is no character delineation, no drama, no play of the basic emotions, and no portrayal of human nature – in short, there is nothing in it which can be called great poetry. Exposition of the Jain philosophy is the most negligible part of the book.

CULAMANI

Cūlāmani by Tōlamoli devar, follows closely on the heels of Cintāmani. There is practically no plot in this poem, which runs to 2131 verses. The king, the obvious hero of the epic, called the crest-jewel (Cūlā-manī), is completely overshadowed by his son who comes to occupy the entire arena. The love escapades of the son form the chief substance of the poem. The old king, having seen his children and grandchildren lead a glorious life, takes to renunciation.

Cūlāmani closely follows Cintāmani in all respects – treatment of the story, employment of metre, poetic expression, description and so on. Here also there are a series of love adventures and a sensuous description of life and its pleasures. But the number of love escapades are much less, language is more flowing and light, and observations on life are more deep and ethical and thought-provoking. The book on the whole makes better reading and it deserves to be more widely read than Cintāmanī. But it is far from being an epic.

NILAKESI

Nilakēṣi pictures the Nīlī of Tiruvālangadu fame as a Jain preacher. She takes cudgels against Kundalakēṣi, a Buddhist preacher. Kundalakēṣi is the name of a Buddhist epic work which has been lost. But the unknown author of Nilakēṣi recalls many of the words of Kundalakēṣi and relates the doctrines of Buddhism. Thus it may be seen that Nilakēṣi is mere propaganda. The whole book (894 verses) with an elaborate sectarian commentary is available. The story of Nilakēṣi is very strange. She goes on meeting and vanquishing Buddhist philosophers one after another, and finally ends up meeting the Buddha himself! Vanity could go no further.

YASODARA KAVYAM

Yasōdara kāvyam by an unknown author is a very short later work in the viruttam metre. The poem contains only 320 verses. It was written with the avowed purpose of proving that women and music are real hindrances to man's emancipation. Here a queen falls in love with the king's elephant tamer because of his music. He is a leper. But she is so infatuated with him that she goes to the extent of murdering her husband and her mother-in-law. She takes birth as several animals one after another in successive births and finally a Jain sage teaches her wisdom. This is an absurd story, the like of which had never been written before or after, in the Tamil language.

It is strange that these puerile compositions Nīlakēṣi and Yasodara Kāvyaṃ are classed as minor epics by a later day critic.²

The Jain epics may thus be seen to fall below the conception of epic poetry or great writing in the past. This was partly because they were written at a time when Jain political influence had disappeared, and were written by persons who had no contact with the main currents of the contemporary national life.

References

- 1 Jesudasan. A History of Tamil Literature 1960, page 148.
- 2 C W Damodaram Pillai, Culamani 1889, Introduction page 3

KAMBA RĀMĀYANAM

Two of the greatest literary achievements of the Tamil muse are Tirukkural and Kamba Rāmāyanam. Kural is a charter for human conduct, it transcends all limitations of time and space. It applies with equal force to men and women of all climes, of all times, of all creeds, castes and classes. Perhaps it was easy for its author to draw up such a universal testament, for the basic needs of man in regard to physical wants, mental aptitudes and spiritual goals are the same the world over.

But, for Kambar things were not so easy. The story which he took up was limited by space, its characters, action and inter-relationship had all been determined for him, he could not have a free hand in all these, and again they could not be so easily understood elsewhere than in India, and that too generally only in the Hindu fold. Yet he has achieved a classic of universal appeal which can be the pride of any language and any people. Kural has been translated into many of the world languages but Kambar has not been translated that is the only difference.

Kambar, the King of Tamil Literature and the Emperor of Poesy as he is often called, was to say the least, the result of penances, tapas, performed by the Tamil Muse for ages. His Rāmāyana marks the crowning glory of Tamil literary production. However, the position was quite complicated for him. First, the choice of a subject. He could have easily written a new story, but the adaption of an existing story was simpler. He easily chose the Rāmāyana because the story here, unlike the Mahābhārata, was simple, it revolved round only three characters, the hero Rāma, the heroine Sīta, and the villain (in the twentieth century parlance) Rāvana. Given these chief actors, Kambar had a canvas spacious enough to paint his epic. The story of the Rāmāyana was everybody's property. So when Kambar narrates it, the discerning reader may be expected to observe the manner of his narration, and not the story itself.

Again, the language had been perfected and its great potentialities fully explored by the time Kambar came on the scene. We shall quote Mr. Maharajan in his inimitable words. 'Kambar had behind him an unbroken poetic tradition of over a thousand years. He did not have the advantage, which the Tamil poets of early Spring had. Before his arrival, the Tamil language had been handled by scores of masters, while it was still malleable and responsive, the Sangham poets had conferred upon the language a delicate reticence and austerity. Tīruvalluvar had given it a lucidity, precision and terseness. The Ālvārs and the Nāyanmārs had given the language an extraordinary suppleness and a warm and moving song quality. It appeared as if all the potentialities of the language had been thoroughly exploited before Kambar's arrival. But, in spite of these handicaps, Kambar's genius gave to the language fresh powers of articulation and made it serve the pure perfection of poetry.'¹

The Kamba Rāmāyana has to be viewed and studied in the background of real history and not of our whims and fancies. Born and bred and steeped in the Kāvēri culture, the poet had not seen a bright and powerful empire around him. The Chōlas were still, only local chiefs, not powerful monarchs, yet not dormant, but valiantly struggling for power and supremacy in their own land. Contemporary life was not as ideal or as glamorous as he would have wished it. So he pictures an ideal rule, an ideal life and an ideal people in Kōsala nadu, what he has portrayed is not real at all. His ethics, his patriotism and his valour are all on the ideal plane. While speaking of Kambar, we feel it is wrong to think of Brahminism or Jainism or Buddhism as forces which had moulded his narration and his outlook, we can only think of Kāvēri-ism and Kambar-ism. To say that he copied this from Sangham poetry, the other from Kural and a third from the Ālvārs and Nāyanmārs as many critics love to imagine, is not to recognise the dimensions of his writing. To one who has a panoramic view of life, of human character, its depth and innermost secrets, all these have effortlessly and unconsciously fitted into their places. There is no question of copying or adapting. Kambar had a great legacy in art and letters, all the good things of the past are his own. He reproduces them in his work in a better form and to a better purpose, he does not learn them, they are all simply his.

When Kambar chose the Rāmāyana, he did not choose it because Rāma was considered the incarnation of Viṣṇu the Supreme Being, he chose it only for the potentialities for epic creation which it offered. Kambar did not merely portray Rāma as others before him had portrayed him, he even elevated him to the level of the high ideal hero he had in mind. He was a supreme artist. The religion of the artist is to mould things according to his ideals, the critic can only assess how far the artist has succeeded in his creation. For aught we know, Kambar might have been a staunch Śaiva, that does not preclude him from making a great classic of the story of Rāma and if need be, even from portraying Rāma as the Supreme Being of all religion. As one critic has remarked, Kambar had made three major currents of influence - the spirit of sheer aesthetic enjoyment of the Sangham period, the spirit of ennobling ethics in Kural, and the bhakti spirit of devout worship fostered by a religion in the shadow of Sanskritism before him - flow into one broad stream ²

Kambar took the story of the Rāmāyana from Vālmiki and has acknowledged it. The Vaisnava canon had also helped him with not a few delicate embellishments. The entire story, its narration and presentation, all the characters, their behaviour pattern, the situations and the drama, are all his own ³. It is wholly absurd to say that Kambar's work is a translation of Vālmiki's Rāmāyana. The mere fact that the first poet in Sanskrit, Vālmiki, gave the outline of the story to Kambar does not mean that the Tamil book is a translation. The Tamil book is entirely different from the Sanskrit in respect of everything except perhaps the names of the characters and the outline of the story – different in plot, in construction, in place, in age, in culture, in physical environment, in human relationship and in accepted values and ideals. We shall desist from saying more.

Following in the footsteps of the Ālvārs and the Nāyanmārs, Kambar has absolute command over the art of versification, he always has his fingers on the pulse of the people and his vocabulary, be it Tamil or Sanskritic, echoes the beating of this pulse. Again the dramatic situations. On every page in the narrative we have a short play. Characters appear, speak or act, the story works up to a pitch, and suddenly there is a curtainfall, the curtainfall is objectively perceivable as on a stage. Kambar is a great master in this technique of stage management. Combined with this management is the dialogue. Modern stage dialogue writers can learn it with profit from our poet. The very short boat scene in which Guha ferries Bharata and the royal entourage across the Ganges is a classic instance bringing into play all these elements.

The boat scene is here summarised to introduce the dramatic element to the reader.

We know that Rama, who was due to be crowned, was driven to the forest by Kaikeyī the mother of Bharata. Bharata, who was absent from the city at the time, came to know of Rama's exile only on his return. Spurning the crown which was waiting for him, he started in pursuit of Rama to bring him back and place him on the throne. His party had to cross the Ganges on their way. Guha, the leader of the hunters who ferried the entire royal party, placed Bharata and his brother, the three widowed queens and the sages like Vasista on his own boat, and himself rowed the boat across. He was an uneducated hunter who did not know any of the party. So as the boat was smoothly gliding over the wide expanse of the waters, he asked Bharata who the first lady, Kausalya, was “Bharata replied ‘She is the noble one who gave birth to him who had given birth to all the worlds; she is the one, who, because I was born, renounced all the wealth of royalty’ Guha fell at Kausalya’s feet and sobbed, whereupon she asked who he was. In reply Bharata told her that he was Guha, the sweetest friend of Rama and elder brother to Laksmana, Satrugna and himself. As Guha wept, the eyes of Bharata and Satrugna became wet with tears. Kausalya comforted them all in a song, which breathes the very spirit of serene benediction. As we read the song in the original, the air becomes vibrant with a thousand angelic wings, which waft a balmy breeze over the bruised heart of Man.

“None of the word-magic of Kambar or the regality of his tone can come through in a translation, but lest the narrative should be interrupted, the following version of Kausalya’s utterance is given

‘Grieve you not, my sons, grieve no more
It is as well that the warriors of Truth renounced the Realm and came to the wilderness Befriend this mighty warrior, who stands like a heroic elephant, with arms strong as the hills,
and befriending him,

may the Five of you, becoming one, govern this wide Earth
for many and many a year '

In the mellowness of her grief, Kausalya's mother-heart embraces the lowly hunter as one of her own blue-blooded sons. There is in this song a certain epic nobility of thought, which lifts the reader above human pettiness.

"Pointing to Sumitra, who looked like Virtue herself, Guha asked 'Pray tell me who is this lady brimming over with love' And Bharata replied 'She is the Junior Queen of the one, who died in order that unfaltering Truth might live. She is the great one, who begot that inseparable brother and showed that adorable Rama had a brother too '

"After this introduction, Kambar feels embarrassed that Guha's attention might fall on Kaikēyi. This feeling of embarrassment is brought out with superb poignancy in the next stanza.

Her spouse gone to the cremation ground, her son gone down the sea of grief, Rama - that ocean of Grace - gone to the merciless jungle, the woman, who measured with the wanton cruelty of her mind, all the worlds, which, of yore,
Mystic Vishnu had gauged with his height -
Pointing to this woman - Guha said, 'Pray, tell me who she is, '

“Now, Kambar makes Bharata give vent to all the pent up fury of his mind. He replied

She is the Author of all evil,
the foster-mother of Revenge,

She is the one who has ground me down mercilessly

Despite my lying in her accursed womb so long,
she is the one, the only one,

who has a beaming grief-free face in a world where all bodies seem dead

Guess you not who she is ?

The one who stands this-wise is the one who has generated me

“These were bitter words, which created an awkward situation for the entire assembly. The poet makes haste to relieve them and the reader from this predicament by bringing down the curtain on the boat scene. He hurriedly changes gear from a long ponderous metre to a short snappy one

Even this pitiless woman
Guha saluted with his holy hands as his mother

The boat, like a wingless swan, swiftly reached ashore

“Rare dramatic skill has been employed by the poet in retrieving a situation, which in lesser hands, might well have degenerated into bathos. The similarity between a boat with in-drawn oars and wingless swan is so startling that the attention of the reader is diverted from a distressing predicament to the comeliness of an apt simile and to the urgent need for disembarkation ” 4.

Characterization is the chief forte of Kambar. Every character in the epic has a personality of his or her own and in a couple of words we can identify the person. No one is too small for Kambar in this regard. Mantaraḥ, the Kūṇi, Sumitraḥ and so many other minor characters come to life at a magic touch from the poet. It is not as though characterization has been attempted only with the major characters like Rāma, Sīta, Hanumān or Kumbhakarna.

We have not said here a word about the descriptions in Kambar – descriptions of human beings, nature, emotions and situations, they are there in any place we choose to lay our fingers on. Abstract metaphysics and philosophy also we have in sufficient depth. In the invocatory verses in each kāṇḍa, the words of praise from Virāṭa and the like, and even in descriptions like sunrise, we see Kambar forgetting the immediate present, and going to the roots of all being. The philosophy so touched upon, though apparently Vaiṣṇava, is not sectarian, but universal.

So this is the Rāmāyana of Kambar. It is only in the fitness of things that while we had dealt with the other topics in a matter of fact manner, we have gone deeper in the case of this one subject. The Rāmāyana of course consists of six books or kāṇḍas making up a total of more than ten thousand verses, the last book, the Yuddha kāṇḍa is naturally very large, the length of all the other kāṇḍas put together. The epic begins with a description of the state and the city, and Rāma's birth, and ends with the crowning of Rāma after Rāvaṇa is slain and Sīta is rescued.

Many prejudiced and distorted accounts, legends and superstitions have grown round the name of Kambar that it is not easily possible to extricate the poet out of the maze of such material. He is said to have been of a low caste; there were organised attempts to run down his caste, stories abound to show that he was not in favour at the royal court, that he was actually belittled by the great poetess Avvai, that he was a poor man not knowing where his next meal would come from, that he was shunted about between his place and Sri Ranganam in a hectic attempt to secure the approval of the orthodox for his epic, that he was really in the good books of Sarasvatī, who always came to his succour when the need arose. Scholars have written the most contradictory views about his book – that he wrote his epic when there was no empire, when the Chōlas were struggling to come into power, that he wrote his epic when the Chōla empire was at its zenith, and so on. We do not enter here into any controversy regarding any of these stories or regarding his date. His book is before us. He has praised therein his patron Sadayan of Vennainallūr in ten situations. The commendatory verses to the Rāmāyana say that he was a vallal of Tiru Alundur in Chōlanādu, he was a kavi-cakravarthi, he published his Rāma kāthai on the asta day of the month of Panguni, in the presence of Lord Ranganātha, under the patronage of Sadayan of Vennainallūr in the sākā year 807 (A. D. 885). Scholars have distorted all the statements reproduced here except the one, Chōlanādu. It is not possible to discuss here even a single one of the controversies.⁵ We shall be content just to state that Kambar wrote his epic in the year A. D. 885, not in any royal court, but in the presence of Sadayan of Vennainallūr (a village which has now disappeared, a few miles for Tiru Alundur, Kambar's place) Low caste is certainly no bar to a poet, but the fact is that Kambar came of a high caste from an affluent family, and Sadayan was not a patron in the western sense but a connoisseur who encouraged Kambar in his literary efforts

There has been no other Rāmāyana in any language after Vālmiki and before Kambar This is natural because in all the languages of India, the evolution of literature took place long after the days of Kambar His Rāmāyana had so impressed learned men that they called him the most learned of poets. His book seems to have been widely popular in the neighbouring linguistic areas of Andhra, Kannada and Kerala, Kamba Rāmāyana discourses had been conducted in these areas and the princes and the others had created many endowments for remunerating the exponents of Kamba Rāmāyana there For eleven centuries since it was written, it has remained a potent force for shaping the education, culture and religious faith of the Tamilnad in particular and South India in general. Kamba Rāmāyana discourses still continue to attract thousands of people from all ranks of society, who are thrilled by the songs Kambar will live for all time, because his voice is the voice of Eternity

But yet, the age of epic poetry has passed We are now living in an age when everything has to be condensed - in time, in space and even in material Vast expanse of time, vast expanse of space and a luxurious wealth of material can no longer exist for us Everything in art and letters has got dwarfed, in the name of progress and advancement, and in the process, our faculties of vision and understanding, of creative appreciation and enjoyment, have also dwarfed. The total abandon and reverence, the sheer joy of absolute surrender to artistic appreciation, necessary for the study of great poetry is no more possible for us. The time and leisure required for the enjoyment of the epic proportions of Kambar's work, the company, and the vast gatherings of kindred souls-are no longer possible. And so we have become physically, emotionally, intellectually and spiritually incapable of studying and knowing Kambar. We are content to frisk round him and get thrilled over glimpses from the fringes. That is all very good. But we have become unfit to know him as an integrated whole personality, as the great epic bard of all time, as the universal poet. Blessed are the few who are yet able to visualise him as such a poet.

References

- 1 Kamban S. Maharajan, page 7.
- 2 Jesudasan, A History of Tamil Literature 1960, page 163, a study of the author's section on Kambar will be very stimulating
- 3 For an evaluation in English of some situations in Valmiki and in Kambar, a study of Justice Maharajan's Kamban will be very rewarding
- 4 The entire passage is reproduced from Justice Maharajan's Kamban, Sahitya Akademi 1972, page 40-42, with minor alterations
- 5 All of them have been elaborately discussed in my forthcoming Tamil Volume of the History of Tamil Literature, 9th Century-Part 1

THE ŚAIVA CANON – I

The suppression of the alien Kalabhra clan by Pāndiyan Kadumkōn by the end of the 6th century had helped a revival of the ancient orthodox religions of the land. Great spiritual preceptors both in Śaivism and in Vaiṣṇavism toured the entire Tamil country, sanctifying the temples by their songs, and directing people, the masses and the elite, towards a higher and godly way of life. In the Śaiva fold, such preceptors are said to be four and they have had the most powerful hold on the minds of the people from that day to this, during a period of about thirteen centuries, and the hold shows every tendency to become stronger with the passing of the years. The movement set afoot by the preceptors has come to be called the bhakti movement, one of absolute selfless unquestioning surrender to God. This surrender we find has enriched the people's lives, enriched art and letters, and enriched the dimensions of life itself by ushering in an era of universal brotherhood in the name of God. The songs of the saints of this bhakti movement form the Śaiva canon, it is called the Tiru murai (sacred canon).

JNANA SAMBANDHA

Tiru Jñāna Sambandha, the first writer in the Śaiva canon, has sung 4158 verses, in 384 decads, all of them set to music. He was born in the first half of the 7th century at Śikali in the Chōlanād. When he was three, he had a visitation of Divine Grace and from then on he was a divine child. He toured the Tamil country unceasingly, singing the praise of Śiva in hundreds of Śiva shrines, from Rāmēśvaram in the extreme south to the northern limits of Tamiḷnad. Śaiva legends say that many miracles were performed by him. The greatest of his exploits was the vanquishing of the Jains at Madurai in philosophic disputation and the re-conversion of the Pāndīya ruler back to the Śaiva fold. This meant that Jainism in Tamiḷnad was given a death blow, it never could raise up its head thereafter as a political or social force. Sambandha, as the champion of music, had always launched a powerful attack on the Jains in his songs: they were in his opinion opposed to Tamil culture, its language, music and religion.

Among the hymn singers, he was the greatest beyond doubt. He attained beatitude at the young age of sixteen, but the volume of his writing now available is indeed quite large, his is the largest contribution in the Śaiva canon. The greatest contribution of Sambandha to Tamil literature is in the field of music. Though music formed the second division of Tamil, it had been ruthlessly suppressed by the austerity of Jainism in the three centuries, 3 to 6 A D. It is to the lasting glory of Sambandha that he actually resurrected Tamil music and placed it on the high pedestal due to it, single-handed. He calls himself in many of his poems Sambandha, master of Tamil and of Music. Other hymnists in Śaivism and Vaiṣnavism had no doubt sung musical pieces, but no one called himself a master and champion of music or gave such importance to music in his songs, and no one has been acclaimed in later literature and legend as a great exponent of music. Sambandha carried in his hands a pair of cymbals given to him by Śiva for marking time while singing. He was accompanied in his tours of the shrines by Nīlakantha Yālppāna and his wife, who accompanied him on their yāl (lyre). The variety of musical as well as literary compositions sung by him are unequalled by any other. He had invented many new forms in prosody and metre, the varieties of difficult verses (citrakkavi) employed by him had never been attempted by any other poet or hymnist.

The songs of Jñāna Sambandha give us the feeling that though the vedas were considered the supreme scriptures, the concept of Aryan and non-Aryan or Tamilian did not exist in his day. He always refers to himself as the Tamil expert, the master of Tamil, and never once as the Aryan, evidently he considered all the brahmins of his day only as Tamilians and never cared or bothered to call them anything else. People of a later day may call him an Aryan, but he never spoke of himself in that manner. Besides, Nambiyāṇḍar nambī of the early 11th century calls him only Tamiḷākaran, the fountain of all Tamil, and never as Aryan. In the years after Śāṅkara, caste prejudices developed and cleavage between Sanskrit studies and Tamil scholarship widened. The smārtas, who generally hail Śāṅkara as their ācārya, have never claimed Sambandha, though a brahmin, as their own, it is only the Śaivas who claim him, as their ācārya, this was because in the later day society, a brahmin had come to mean Sanskrit, while a Śaiva meant only Tamil.

The position is somewhat different with Appar. He mentions the Aryan in several places (1246, 2321, 2325, 2552, 2946 of his songs) He says that Śiva is both Aryam and Tamil, He is Sanskrit and Tamil, He is the Aryan and the Tamilian. The omission of Arya by Sambandha and the repetition of the term by Appar is significant. Sambandha being a brahmin, does not very much care about his being a brahmin but always lays great emphasis on his Tamilian nationality, Appar not being a brahmin goes on emphasising the concept of unity, that God is both the Aryan and the Tamilian.

Sambandha has also sung many lyrical poems on the aham model, placing himself in the position of a maiden pining for the love of the Lord. Many of such verses are supremely lyrical. Among all the singers of the Śaiva canon, Sambandha is the one who had worked the largest number of miracles. All of them were performed not for his own sake, but for the benefit of the suffering society at large, for individuals and for communities, and viewed in this light, the keynote of the miracles may be said to be service to humanity. The life of Sambandha thus exemplifies the truth that real service to fellow beings is also real service to God.

Sambandha has sung on the largest number of shrines, he has also sung the largest number of musical tunes He has also referred in his songs to a large number of puranic stories He rules that we shall not try to fathom the mystery of the conferment of His Grace with our limited language and our limited reasoning faculty - it is unfathomable, those who desire to get over the ills of life should have faith in Him

Sambandha was young in years, this element is discernible in all his poetry and action The variety of difficult verses composed by him testify to his youthful vigour A child is impulsive and we find him always seeking divine intervention for the relief of suffering and the grant of succour to mankind The gifts which he received from Lord Siva were not asked for, his prayers were all only for the welfare of society His tender age is also discernible in his description of nature No other poet in the Śaiva hymns has described luxuriant nature so vividly, so profusely and intimately, and so often as he, he sings in detail of rivers and clouds, of animals and birds and trees and plants, all pointing to a sublimation in the love of God

It is well known that Sambandha carried on a relentless tirade against the Jains and the Buddhists. But yet, believing in the Omnipotence and Omnipresence of Siva, he could not help singing that Siva directed the Jain and the Sakkiya cults also and that even their untrue words are his own sport ¹

APPAR

Saint Appar, senior contemporary of Sambandha lived to a ripe old age He has sung 3066 verses Born a Śaiva, he went over to Jainism, but at the prayers of his sister, Lord Śiva intervened and brought him back into the Śaiva fold. He survived the persecution of the Jains, and by his godliness and devotion also won over the Pallava ruler back to the Śaiva fold. He toured the entire Tamiḻnad, like Sambandha, not only singing the praises of Śiva, but also doing everywhere manual labour in the temple, in cleaning the temple premises. A new dignity and dimension have been bestowed on physical labour and the sense of outward cleanliness, by the life and service of Appar. His songs are always on a higher ethical plane. He has sung a few songs set to music (paṇ) but most of his writing is not set to the paṇ type of music. He is famous as the master of tāṇḍakam, a form of verse with eight feet to the line, capable of expressing mellowed thoughts in a lingering metre. His language is always simple, direct and easily understandable, without any artistic or laboured flourishes. The feeling of devotion and surrender expressed in his poems is always direct and simple and of course profoundly genuine. His Tiru Angamālai is being sung by all children, it is a short poem in which he dedicates every organ of his body to the service of God.² Divine intervention in his life came comparatively late and he was quite experienced in life at the period. Hence his language and thought express this richness of experience and maturity of wisdom, which is rare among younger people. He met and befriended Sambandha and the two visited many shrines together. He was called Appar (the father) by his younger contemporary Sambandha, because of his age and his deep devotion, and this became the name by which he was generally known thereafter.

His first book consists of three parts - the part in pan, 21 poems, the Tiru nērisai 58 poems, and Tiru viruttam 34 poems. Of these the second part is the largest. Each poem here used to be sung by the canon singers (known as ōduvārs) in the tune of the Sāmavēda,³ even vedic singers used to listen to their recital spellbound, with admiration.

The second book of his songs is known as the Tiruk-kuruntohai. It contains 1015 verses and they are the essence of his teachings. Here we see the full realisation of a spiritual experience and the joy resulting therefrom. Along with all the great spiritual thinkers, Appar also believes that God-realisation can result only through His Grace. It is very remarkable that his devotion had universal acclaim in his own day. Appūdi a brahmin of distant Tīngalūr had made many public benefactions in his name, even without seeing him. Appar generally made no prayer for divine intervention by miracles, a solitary exception is the bringing back to life of Appūdi's son.

His third book is the Tirut-tāndakam; Appar is himself known as the Prince of Tāndakam, Tīrumangai ālvār on a later day composed a poem of 30 verses on his model. The tāndakam is a long drawn verse with eight feet to the line. Here we find sincere and genuine feeling, charged with the deepest emotion. Repetition of course could not be avoided, and in an age when people had all eternity at their disposal, the singing of the tāndakam exercised such a spell over the masses which was deep, soulful and unequalled. It left a feeling of solace and peace which no other hymn did. The very repetition evokes tears of joy and of contrition and repentance, even in the twentieth century.

The songs of Appar, Tiru Nāvukkarasu, the Prince of Words, are a passionate prayer for the conquering of the senses and are a complete surrender to God as the requisite state therefor. Where others say that the births should be ended, he says that the birth should be welcomed⁴, because it enables us to see the dance of Natarāja and experience the supreme joy it confers. Appar the reformed Śaiva challenged the authority of the Pallava emperor to summon him, and so things of the world mean nothing to him. He spurned the pleasures of life and preached a unique freedom of the soul and his songs are a clarion call of this freedom. This spirit has enabled him to see God in everything. Caste and class are nothing, he is prepared to worship even an outcaste and a leper if God dwells in his heart⁵. He never laments that God deserted him, he is sure of God's succour and grace; in that blissful assurance, he says his duty is only to do His service, without caring for any return. It is this spirit which had made Milton centuries later to say, 'they also serve who only stand and wait'. Some are fond of calling Appar a mystic, but there is no obscure or unfathomable mysticism in his sayings. All his outpourings come straight from the heart and any ardent and gifted devotee can indeed feel the same. Many of his sayings have become proverbial, expressing in crisp and telling language the wisdom of the ages.

SUNDARA

Saint Sundara is the third ācārya of the Śaiva canon. He has sung just 1026 verses. Probably he lived one generation after Appar. A marriage fixed for him by his parents was stopped by divine intervention. Later Śiva is said to have helped him to marry twice. He had promised his second wife never to leave her, but when he is moved by the thought of the temple celebrations in the place of his first wife, in the month of Pangunī (March – April) he leaves the second wife. Immediately he loses the power of sight. He realises that this is a punishment. But his prayers to the Lord are of no immediate avail, he has to suffer, his eyesight is restored to him only after some time. Sundara is called the comrade of Śiva, but that has not helped him to take liberties in the matter of worldly ethics.

Although Sundara is a Śaiva ācārya coming immediately after Sambandha and Appar, his whole life is cast in an altogether different mould. Miracles also happen through him, but most of them relate to his own life; they were worked by Śiva to provide comforts to him in life, the bringing back to life of a child from a crocodile in Avināśī is the only exception. In this respect, he is vastly different from the two earlier ācāryas. In the case of Sambandha, miracles happened to help members of the society and to relieve their suffering, no miracle was asked for by him for his own sake. In the case of Appar, miracles did no doubt happen. His bringing back to life the son of Appūdi is certainly intervention by a miracle. But in all the other instances, [Śiva worked miracles to relieve the suffering of Appar himself and to help him spiritually. He even afflicted a dire colic on him to reclaim him into the Śaiva fold.

Sundara however stands on a different category altogether. Except the one instance where he loses his power of sight, which is in the nature of a punishment, all the other instances are for providing comforts to him in the worldly life. In this sense, we may believe that his story is much more on the human plane than those of the other two, which are altogether on different planes.

Three episodes in the life of Sundara deserve special mention. One is the role of messenger of love which Siva acted at Tiru Ārūr for him. When Sundara returned from Tiru Orriyūr to Paravai his first wife, she had heard of his second marriage at Orriyūr and so refused to see him. So, in order to appease her and make her receive Sundara, Śiva had to go to her on his behalf several times at dead of night. The second is the story of another devotee Kalikkāma who was angry with Sundara for having dared to use the Lord Siva as a messenger of love. Śiva had to intervene here through a miracle to appease him and make him befriend Sundara. The last is the story of Sēramān which gets interwoven into Sundara's life towards the end. Sēramān, a prince of the Sēra country, himself a devotee whose songs are included in the Eleventh Canon, takes Sundara to his own city, from where both attain final beatitude.

Sundara's greatest contribution is to the Śaiva hagiology where, in a sweet little poem, he says that he is the servant of the servants of God and enumerates a list of sixty such men and women of God, and nine groups of the devotees of God.⁶ This song of his was the inspiration, four centuries later, to Sēkkilār in his writing of the Periya purāṇam.

Coming immediately after Appar and Sambandha, Sundara frequently refers to them in his songs, he mentions in particular that Sambandha caused an understanding of God and Tamil through his music⁷ Following in that tradition, his own songs, all set to music, are also simple and sweet. Occasionally there is a pleasant description of nature and a luscious enjoyment of life in his poems, but his mind transcends that plane. In one place, he asks poets to go no more singing the praise of men for material benefits, but to praise the Lord and the Lord only⁸. Some of his most moving songs are those sung when he lost his eye-sight, the affliction there was physical and quite real, his lament is indeed heart-rending⁹.

The songs of these three saints is called the Dēvāram and it forms the first seven books of the Saiva canon. Saint Umāpati says that Sambandha sang 16 thousand padikams, Appar 49 thousand, and Sundarar 38 thousand - making a total 103 thousand padikams or decads, this means that the verses in their songs would have been well over a million. But tradition also mourns that the major part had been eaten away in palm leaf by termites and we are left with only 8250 verses.

MANIKKA VĀCAKA

We now pass on to Saint Mānikka vācaka, who lived probably a hundred years after Sundara. He is the well known author of Tiruvācakam, a collection of 656 devotional verses. This book, like Kural, is familiar in translation to discerning people in English and many other languages besides. The story of Mānikka vācaka is very well known. He was born at Tiru Vādavūr in the Pāndiya country and his profound learning secured recognition by his being appointed minister to the king. While on the way to purchase horses for the king, he met the divine guru at Perunturai and from that moment, having had supreme spiritual enlightenment in His presence, he became His slave and forgot his duty to the king his master. For this neglect of duty, he had to undergo punishment at the hands of the king. He supplicates himself to his Master, many miracles happen, the king realises the state of mind of Mānikka vācaka and releases him from his service. The saint thereupon goes to Cīdambaram visiting several shrines on the way, dictates all his songs to the Lord Himself who acts as his scribe there, and there attains mukti.

The whole of Tiruvācakam is sheer poetry, of a very high order, to use the author's own words, it is bone-melting poetry¹⁰. The book contains 51 separate poems, of which 13 represent folk song motifs. The story says that he went about mixing with the common people and children and absorbed the plays and games of the girls, into his poems to express his feelings of surrender and devotion to God. Many of these motifs had never before been put to this kind of poetic use. The other saints sang decads of song in temples and, after they came away from the temples, devotees there learnt them and sang them in the temples and in the congregations. They were planned to be so sung. Not so the songs of Mānikka vācaka. They were not generally sung in the shrines in his time. Except at Tirup-Perunturai, Uttarakōśamangai, Tiruk-Kaluk-kunram and Cīdambaram, where he was vouchsafed a vision of the guru, the saint did not sing at the shrines;

hence probably the legend that Natarāja Himself came to him at Cīdambaram and wrote out all the songs to his dictation, as otherwise there was no means of gathering the songs. His relationship with God is personal, his songs are just his offerings of his own soul at the feet of his master and guru, Lord Śiva. In all his poems, he praises the glory of Śiva, who had deigned to bestow His infinite grace on himself, humble and undeserving though he was. This element is present in all his songs.

It is not as though Mānikka vācaka was always in a state of ecstasy, a permanent stage reached from an experience of God's grace. Far from it. Like every mortal, he had his periods of darkness and pangs of separation too, and these are easily perceivable in the poems. The Uttarakōśamangai part of his story bears witness to this element. He had a full realisation of God and an ecstatic spiritual joy, it passed off and a period of unhappiness and despair set in, he cried to God and cried out in agony, and again he had a vision and an experience. This process seemed to go on alternately until he got the final realisation in Cīdambaram. All these changes in experience are clearly echoed in the songs. Hence the song content is entirely and intimately personal. The folksong motifs echo this personal relationship and as a rule they all represent periods of joy and vision, not despair. Along with the joy of servitude and supplication, there is also in Tiruvācakam a strain of strong conviction that he could not be shaken off. In such places, the poems portray the complete trust and assurance of a little child in its mother.

Words have no use for him He first sings as the experience gushes forth vocally He does not very much think of music or of imagery There are some verses in Tiruvācakam where the metre does not appear to be perfect, but it is not as though he does not know prosody, such passages only portray his inward struggle He also employs the love theme or aham, but even here, that note is subordinated to that of praise of the Lord

It is doubtful if Tirukkōvai is his composition and so it is not dealt with here

THE SAIVA CANON

The songs sung by these four saints are quite large in volume In the days of Emperor Rājarāja Chōla, Nambiyāndār nambī collected the songs and grouped them into different books The songs of Sambandha formed the first three books of the Śaiva Canon; those of Appar the books 4, 5, and 6, those of Sundara the book 7, Tiruvācakam of Mānikka vācaka formed Book 8 Other books were also added on by Nambī These first eight books in particular had been shaping the thoughts, actions and aspirations, and regulating the life and culture of the Śaiva community for more than a thousand years

From the sangam period to the period of Sambandha and Appar is a long jump, there had been a gap of more than four centuries This period has been rightly called by historians as the dark age because all Tamīl culture, art and letters and religion had been suppressed by the Kalabhra raiders who held sway in Madurai from about 250 to 575 A D There was religion and worship in the earlier period, but the continuity was broken A few religious writers were there in the Śaiva and the Vaiṣṇāva Canon even during this period, but they were all in the north, in the Pallava and the Chōla territories, outside the Pāṇḍiya country Aided by the efforts of such writers, both the religions took on the new life by the middle of the 7th century Where there is repression, there is greater effort and dedication. The Kalabhra repression was partly responsible for the sudden out burst of religious writings in the seventh century Temple worship which was dormant in the Pāṇḍiya country was started vigorously now And with the tours of the two Nāyanmārs, a fresh wave of bhakti, selfless unquestioning surrender to the Supreme God, swept the entire land The songs of these saints are no doubt poetry of a high order, having intrinsic aesthetic beauty and sweetness, but were also powerful motive forces in life, urging people to religious action Whatever might have been the position of Sanskrit earlier, these simple songs in elegant musical Tamil won over all the people high and low, including the Sanskritists, because they moved the hearts of the Tamil people in a manner never before known. The culmination of this change of heart was attained two centuries later, when the Chōlā Empire began to materialise on the banks of the Kāvēri, and a new golden era of political supremacy which was synonymous with religious culture and temple building was ushered in.

References

- 1 Sambandhar devaram 1860, 2024, 2375.
- 2 Devaram verses 4240 - 51
- 3 Śrī Subbiah Desikar of Tirukkalar once demonstrated before me this traditional singing, any carnatic or vedic music-knowing person can listen to it enthralled for any length of time. Unfortunately, such Singers are becoming rare and discriminating listeners are becoming still rarer. When such is the case in the present day when there is supposed to be a political and cultural awakening in the land, we can very well understand how the division of isai Tamil died out in early Tamilnad (vide pages 39-40)
- 4 Ibid 4941
- 5 Ibid 7182
- 6 Sundarar Devaram padikam 39
7. Devaram 7886
8. Ibid 7564 – 73.
- 9 Ibid 8126–35, 8188–98 and others.
- 10 Tiruvacakam Poem 40 3

THE ŚAIVA CANON - II

The Śaiva Canon consists of twelve books. An account of the first eight books has been given so far. We shall say here a few words about the other four books.

THE NINTH BOOK

The ninth Book is known as Tiru Isaippā. It is a very short book containing 29 poems in 301 verses by nine authors. All the poems are musical pieces and hence the name Isaippā. The book, though very short, is remarkable in many ways. More than half the number of poems are on Natarāja of Cidambaram¹. It has the only pallāndū poem in the Śaiva Canon. Gandarāditta, who was a crowned Chōla monarch between 950 and 957, has sung a poem on Nataraja, included here². The book includes four poems by Sēndanār, a harijan³. All the poems are set to music and the pan is noted for each poem, a pan named sālarapāni, not found in the Dēvāram, is found here⁴. The Dēvāram songs are all on Śiva and are not in praise of any other deity. Here, Sēndanar has sung a poem on Muruga. The songs had great popularity in the Chōla period⁵. Most of them may be considered to have been composed at the inducement of Gandarāditta and his Queen Sembiyan mādēvi. Karuvūr Dēva, who enjoyed the patronage of Rajaraja I and his son Rajendra, has sung more than a third of this volume.

Tiru Isaippā is also great poetry, one voicing a soulful surrender to the One Supreme, but because of the greater brilliance of Dēvāram and Tiruvācakam, it pales into a second rank

TIRUMULAR

During the Kalabhra interregnum there were religious poems in both Śaivism and Vaisnavism. Tirumūlar and Kāraikkāl Ammaiyār belong to the period. Tirumūlar on the banks of the Kāvērī wrote his Tiru mantiram of 3000 short verses, which have been grouped by Nambī as the Tenth Book. The name of the book itself is significant. it is a mantra, mystic utterance. Tirumular is considered to be the first of the Siddha (realised soul) poets. His writing warrants this belief. Written in a simple and telling language, the verses employ a good amount of spoken Tamil as well as a greater admixture of Sanskrit. This does not imply that he was later in point of time. He has a directness and forcefulness, born out of the harmony of complete realisation, and a contempt for those engrossed with worldly matters. The very directness makes his writing the highest poetic expression of the most sublime philosophy. He re-stated the gospel that Love is God, just as fifteen centuries later, Gandhi said Truth is God. He emphasized the truth that God is one and mankind is one. Tirumūlar did not believe in the mortification of the body in the mistaken belief that it is a hindrance to the salvation of the soul. He declared emphatically that God did dwell in the body and so the body is to be nourished as an instrument for the attainment of higher knowledge and of salvation. He has laid down a simple code of ethical conduct which can be followed by the lowest and the highest .

 ‘ Offer a bit of a leaf (in the place of a flower) to God, a handful of grass to the cow, a morsel of food to the needy when you take your food, and say a kind word to everyone ’⁶ A point to be noted about Tiru mantiram is that among the twelve books of the Śaiva Canon, it is the only śastra or scripture, ie , a book devoted to philosophy, the others are all devotional songs
 The place of Tirumūlar in Tamil literary history is unique He is a mystic and lays bare his spiritual experiences in all his verses He gives out the experience both in a classical language and in the language of the masses , the ecstatic outpourings of a siddha are also there in his work These three elements perhaps tend to make his poetry uneven and a little obscure in places, although the overwhelming ecstasy of experience and the flash of brilliance are always present. Tirumūlar is a canonised saint

THE ELEVENTH BOOK

Nambī gathered all the other devotional songs which were sung before him and grouped them as the 11th Book, along with his own poems The songs of Kāraikkāl Ammai have been collected into this book
 She has written two musical pieces and two other poems besides. Ammai might have lived in the 4 – 5 centuries, probably as a contemporary of Tirumūlar
 The Padikams of Ammai are musical pieces, where she describes in vivid detail the dance of Nataraja in the cremation ground along with the ghosts which inhabit the place But her other two poems are beautiful lyrics They express the innocent joy and wonder of a child on seeing the form of Śiva, decked with the serpents, the crescent moon and the Ganges. She also expresses the highest truths of philosophy 'It is He that perceives, that makes me perceive, and is the instrument of perception, and also the object perceived' 7

Many other poems, by familiar and unfamiliar authors, go into this book. We have here three poems by Sēramān Perumāḷ, contemporary of Saint Sundara, Tiru Murugārruppadaḷ of Nakkīrar, a piece of Sangham poetry, a few verses by Aiyadīgal Kādavar Kōn, a Pallava chief, who lived before Sundara, and five poems of Pattinattar, besides ten poems of Nambī himself. These poems were apparently strung together, so that all devotional literature written upto that period might be available to the Śaivas and might not be lost.

The 11th Book of the Śaiva Canon is important in another way. It has introduced many new forms of poetic composition. The Irattai manimālai, Mummanikkōvai, Ulā, Orupā orupatu and Nānmanī mālai occur for the first time in Tamil literary history only in this collection, these types of poems had not existed before. Another feature is the inclusion of Tiru Murugārruppadaḷ (as pointed out) and of the second verse of Kuruntohai, as the first poem here, as an epistle from Śiva Himself, these two are Sangham poems.

PERIYA PURANAM

The 12th Book of the Śaiva Canon is Periya Purānam, the lives of godly men. This work holds a unique position in the language in this that it is a work of epic proportions on the glory of the Servants of God It is quite a large work, running to 4286 quatrains, in the viruttam metre The language is always easy, graceful, fluent and charged with emotion The one keynote of this work is bhakti, devotion to God, and viewed from that stand-point, it is a marvellous achievement

The author Sēkkilār, who was also the king's minister, wrote this at the request of his king Kulōttunga II with the avowed goal of weaning him away from a study of the Jain work, Cintāmaṇi ⁸ The work is in a sense a national epic of the Tamil people, because it treats of the lives of the Saints who lived in all the different parts of the Tamīlnad, and belonged to all the classes of society, men and women, high and low, educated and unlettered, we have among the saints princes from all the ruling dynasties of the land, as well as men from the harijan classes, but they are all equal in the devotion and service to God and godly men Sēkkilār transcends the limits of time and space and comprises within the fold of his spiritual democracy even people who lived earlier and who will be living later, in all the distant climes Most of the Saints have to pass through an ordeal where their devotion is put to the severest test, but everyone of them emerges out of it victorious Nothing is impossible for the devotee, sacrifice of all earthly possessions is nothing, he sacrifices his wife, his child, himself, his eyes he plucks out, fights with his own kith and kin, he does not hesitate to punish the king's wife when she smells the flowers intended for God. Devotion to God's emblems is so intense that when he sees the sacred ash on his adversary in combat, he allows himself to be slain rather than fight with a devotee, when a Chōla prince found the matted head (the emblem of Śiva) of a soldier on the battle field, he gives up his own life for the sin of having caused the death of such a soldier. Ordinary persons become great heroes by their simple sacrifices, women also share such sacrifices as equal partners. Including the three Dēvarām singers, the Purānam mentions the lives of seven poets who are also servants of God.

Written by a minister of the Chōla state when Chōla supremacy was at its highest, the poem is not only one of intense devotion, but also one of great majesty and real grandeur, the like of which we rarely meet with in all the wide range of Tamil epic poetry.

A deep and fervent humanism pervades all the songs of the saints and is also very well brought out in the lives of the saints sung by Sēkkilār. Here we may say that the saints care also for humanity at large and strive to ameliorate its suffering. We may even say further that they evince a transcendent humanism, which goes out to the service of not only mankind, but also the animal kingdom and the vegetable kingdom. The words of Tirumular quoted earlier will well illustrate this. The saints saw God in all creation and they seem to have considered service to all creatures as service to God.

Notes and References

- 1 Ninth Tirumurai, Poem 29 5 - 7 and 29
 - 2 Poem 20
 - 3 Poems 4 Poem 19
 - 5 Vide poems 8 - 17.
 6. Tiru mantiram verse 252
 - 7 Ammal, Arbhuta-Tiru antadi verse 20
 - 8 Vide Umapadī Sivam Sekkilar puranam, verses 19 - 21
- One writer has expressed the doubt whether a capable ruler could have been led astray by Cintamani. The answer to this is given in the words of two Christian historians of Tamil literature, extracted on page 110 of this book.

THE VAISNAVA CANON – I

The picture of a general background has been drawn in the previous section under the Śaiva Canon. We shall now straight away take up the text of the Vaisnava Canon. The authors of the Vaisnava Canon are called Ālvārs, they who are deeply immersed in the grace and glory of Viṣṇu (and who will also help to immerse us in that ocean of grace). The Ālvārs are twelve in number¹ and their period ranges from the 6th century to the 9th.

The songs of the Ālvārs are collected together and counted as a total of four thousand, and they are known by the name Nālāyira Divya Prabandham (the four thousand sacred songs). They are in four general sub-divisions of about a thousand verses each. The larger songs of Tirumangaḷ Ālvār and Nammālvār are each over a thousand verses and so they have been grouped into two separate books, the Second the Periya Tirumoli of Tirumangaḷ Alvar and the Fourth the Tiruvōy molī of Nammālvār. Of the other songs, the musical pieces are collected as the first volume, Mudal Āyiram (the first thousand), and the non-musical pieces grouped as the third book called Iyal pā.

We shall examine below, the songs of the Ālvārs, not in the order in which they are grouped in the Canon, but in an approved chronological order.

Bhattar, Vedānta Dēsikan, Manavāla māmuni and many others have arranged the authors differently, but we would follow here the order adopted by Tiru Arangattamudanār, the earliest of all, in his Rāmānuja Nūrrantādi. Any discussion of dates is beyond the scope of our work

EARLY ALVARS

The first Ālvārs (Mudal ālvārs) were three - Poihai, Bhūtam and Pēy, and all of them hailed from the Pallava country. There was Kalabhra rule in the Pāndiya country during the 3rd to the 6th centuries and no saint, Vaiṣṇava or Śaiva, hailed from the Pāndiya country during that period.² The first three Ālvārs sang their songs during this period (5 - 6 centuries). Poyhaiyār was born on a golden lotus in a cool tank in Kānci. Bhutattār was born on a mādhavi flower (the hūptage creeper) in Kadal mallai (Mahabali-puram), and Pēyār was born on a crimson lily in a well in Tiruvallikkēni (Madras), hence they are called ayōṇya (not born from a mother's womb) ³

A beautiful legend says how they met one dark night in the corridor of a house in Tiruk-Kōvalūr and how they saw a vision of Tirumāl (Viṣṇu) there and began to sing His praises ⁴. As there were not enough space for the three of them, they were standing, Viṣṇu entered amidst them, and they felt squeezed. Poihai used the sun as a lamp and Bhutam used devotion as a lamp, to find out the cause of the squeezing. Peyālvār saw the Lord there and began to describe Viṣṇu whom he saw. They have each sung an antādi of 100 venbās, known as the first, second and third antādis. The mantra namō-nārāyaṇā finds place in a song of Poyhai, later it plays a very prominent part in the life and songs of Tīrumangai ālvar Poyhai mentions Tīruvēṅkatam frequently in his songs, Tīruvarangam once, there is also a mention of Kōval idaikalī (corridor) in his songs (86) The other two ālvārs mention many shrines in their songs, including several in Kānci itself Bhūtattār calls himself the great fortunate Tamīlan (74) Bhūtam and Pēy mention Māmallaī and Vinnagar Critics have remarked that as the shrines in these places were built in the 7th century, these ālvārs should have belonged then or later This is not correct The shrines existed much earlier, Narasimha and his successors built the monoliths, this does not mean that the temple also came later Hence the references do not affect the antiquity of the ālvārs

These are the early poems in Vaiṣṇavism and they show a considerable degree of simplicity and religious tolerance, and a wonder and joy, born out of a full and limitless experience of divine grace

TIRUP-PANALVAR

Tirup-Pānālvār, a bard of the lowest caste in society, was an ardent devotee of Viṣṇu at Śrī Rāgam He used to play his yāl instrument on the southern bank of the Kāvērī, in praise of the Lord, as a kind of service to Him. The Lord made known the devotion of the low caste Pāna by ordering the high caste priest to carry him into the temple on his shoulders The Pāna has sung a short poem of ten verses⁵ in praise of the various organs of the physical form of the Lord of Śrī Rāgam Mentioning each feature, the poet pours forth his longing for Him in the manner of a girl yearning for her lover. This one song has earned for him ālvār-hood,

TIRU MALISAI

Tirumalisai ālvār, of the place of that name on the other hand, is a high caste brahmin and a bigot. He always heaps abuse on the Śaiva religion; nor does he spare Jainism or Buddhism. He has written two poems, an antādi of 100 venbās and Tiru chanda viruttam of 120 viruttam verses, set in a rigid rhythmic pattern⁶. His works are philosophical in content but the lyrical quality is mostly absent. With him, the newly evolving Vaisnava religion definitely slides into bigotry and intolerance.

Some of his verses contain great truths spoken in very simple lucid language in an arresting manner, but the general speed of the jingle and its mechanical rhythm wipe out all poetry from the songs, yet we shall see one verse — ‘The tides build up even out of the snow white wide sea, they roll back and merge with the same sea, in like manner, all that are born and that die, and walk and live, out of You, finally are merged in You — such is Your nature (10)’⁷

TONDAR ADIPPODI

Tondaradippodī (the dust of the feet of God’s devotees) has sung two poems⁸, one the Tiruppallielucci and the other Tiru Mālai. The first consists of ten verses, intended to rouse the Lord from His sleep in the early morning and obtain His grace. Tiru Mālai means the Holy Garland. The verses show a high degree of violent bigotry⁹ and intolerance, and at the same time of intense devotion also. According to his biography, his life consisted of extremes and they explain also the extremes in his songs. He makes a complete surrender of himself to God and revels in the resulting joy To him, the Kavēri is more holy than the Ganges because Sri Rangam is on the Kāvēri¹⁰ The appeal of the two poems to the Vaisnavas is so great that they are required to recite them daily in their prayers 'My Lord of Sri Rangam, I have no place and no land no kith nor kin. I hold fast unto Thy feet, Thou that art Supreme, of azure hue I cry out to Thee, O Kṛṣṇa Who is my support, other than Thee ?' ¹¹

KULASEKHARA

Next we take up Kulasēkhara, a Sēra prince of the west coast.

He calls himself the Lord of Kolli, Kūdal (Madurai) and Kōlī (Uraiyūr), this is mere vanity and does not signify much Yet, the fact that he was a prince, was in those days very significant for the cause of Vaisnavism; here he is the only princely poet in the Canon The Pandiya prince had been of great help to Periyālvār, but he was no poet The prince of the Sēra dynasty was styled 'perumāl', irrespective of whether he was a Śaiva or a Vaisnava, we find the Śaiva poet called Seramān - perumāl in an earlier period. Here he is Kulasēkharap-perumāl and so, his songs are Perumāl Tirumoli

His poems are ten, with 105 verses He was most attracted by the Rāmāvatāra and most of his poems are a passionate adoration of this aspect of Viṣṇu. Like Periyālvār, he is fond of celebrating the childhood of Rāma and Kṛṣṇa and he has sung the first lullaby song¹² in Tāmīl,

The first three poems are in praise of Sri Rāgam. Two poems are on the boyhood of Kṛṣṇa. In the first, the girls in the Āyar pāḍi chide him for being unfaithful to each in turn. The second is the very moving lament of Dēvakī, the real mother of Kṛṣṇa who bemoans her own fate in not being able to rejoice in the boyish pranks and feats of the boy, while it was given to Yasōdai to witness and rejoice in them. There is also another moving poem from the lips of Daśaratha, the father of Rama, who mourns his ill luck in sending Rama away to the forest. The next poem in praise of Tillaī Tiruccittrakūtaṁ, is a continuous narrative of the entire story of the Rāmāyana.

All the poems of this Ālvār prince are supremely lyrical in quality and his songs on Tiruvēṅkatam and Vittuvakkōḍu¹³ may be said to be unsurpassed in emotional fervour and supplication. He desires to be born as a bird, a fish, a cup, a tree, a rock, a stream, a step - in fact anything on His Tiruvēṅkatam hill. Even if a mother pushes her child away, it can only cry for her affection and attention, so is the Ālvār. The Vittuvakkōḍu song contains a proverb in each verse.

The lament of Daśaratha¹⁴ after Rama left the city for the forest as instructed by Kaikēyi is one of his best lyrical pieces. The poet really becomes the father and pours forth all the pangs of [separation from the son, The nayaka - nayaki bhāva is frequent in devotional poetry. Periyālvār's role of mother to Kṛṣṇa in his songs is unique. But here Kulasēkhara's role of father for Rama is most unparalleled. For descriptive poetry in the most picturesque and lyrical language, Kulasēkhara is a master in the Vaiṣṇava canon. Probably he supplied many thoughts to Kambar for his epic composition.

PERIYĀLVAR

Next we go to Periyālvār. He was a brahmin from Śrī Villiputtūr, named Viṣṇucittan. He was a spiritual preceptor to the Pandiya ruler, Śrī Vallabha. According to tradition, he established in the king's court that Viṣṇu was the Supreme and got the prize of a purse of gold. When Viṣṇu was taken in procession along the streets, he had a darśan of the deity and fearing that someone may cast an evil eye on Him, he sang a pallāṇḍu poem¹⁵, meaning 'may You live long in all this glory'. Usually it is the mother who does a ritual to remove the evil eye. Because he did this and because he sang almost all his songs on Kṛiṣṇa, placing himself in the position of his mother Yaśōda, he has been hailed by the grateful Vaiṣṇava community as the Periya Ālvār (the Elder Ālvār). As also the foster father of Āṇḍāl, who gave her away in marriage to Viṣṇu, this title seems appropriate to him.

Each of the poems of an ālvār is generally known as the song or Tīrumoli (holy word) of that ālvār. Periyālvār has sung 473 verses in 45 poems, they are the Periyālvār Tīrumoli. The first poem is the Pallāṇḍu, the Nālāyiram (the Vaiṣṇava Canon) quite fittingly opens with the Pallāṇḍu.

Most of his songs are devoted to the Kṛiṣṇāvatāra, there are also a few addressed to Rama. His poems give us the most delightful picture of childhood in the Tamil language. Among all divine children, the child Kṛṣṇa has a very large number of lovely stories woven round him. This child and his pranks are the greatest favourites with the Ālvār. Ālvār was a bachelor, it is astonishing how he has been able to enter into the mind of Yaśōdai and re-live the childhood days of Kṛṣṇa in Gōkulam. The birth of the child, the beauty of his form, the child in the cradle, the address to the moon, the lisping of words, the clapping of hands - and many other little acts related to the child are the subject matter of his poetry. All devotional literature teems with instances of the poet becoming mentally the lady-love and pining for the love of the Lord. But Periyālvār really becoming the mother is the most unique feature in all literature.

His songs are some of the greatest poetry, not only in the Vaiṣṇava Canon but in all literature. As contributions to Tamil literature, his songs are the first in many respects. His is the first pallāndu poem, his pillai-Tamil motifs¹⁶ have helped the evolution of the poem as a type of literary composition. In later years, his tālāttu along with Kulasēkhara's is the first lullaby, giving rise to a vast wealth of such literature in the next thousand years.

ANDAL

Āndāl, the only woman poet among the ālvārs, is the adopted daughter of Periyālvār. Ālvār found her as a baby in his flower garden, and the man who was a confirmed bachelor brought up this girl, as a mother would have. When she came of age, she refused to think of a mortal for a groom. She decked herself as Krisna's bride. She even put on the garlands intended for Him, to see if they were handsome enough to be worn by Him! This irked Ālvār not a little, but Viṣṇu Himself approved of it. She chose Śrī Ranganātha for her bridegroom and her life ends with the marriage and her blissful union with her Lord at Śrī Ranganam.

Her songs numbering in all 173 verses form Tiruppāvai and Nācciyār Tirumoli.¹⁷ Tiruppāvai seems to have been taken from a popular theme of the period where girls go in groups to a river or tank for a bath and pray for the succour of their patron deity. Here Āndāl calls upon her companions to wake up and go with her, singing the praise of the Lord Krisna and seeking His grace on themselves in order to get good food, good cows and milk, good dress and good husbands, and ultimately asking Him to take all of them, of the āyar clan, as His servants for ever and ever. Tiruppāvai is a household word in the Vaiṣṇava community, recited by them daily, particularly in the month of Mārgaḷi. Pāvaiṭ-pāttu seems to have enjoyed immense popularity not only in Tamilnad but in overseas territories also, it is said to be the occasion for a national festival in distant Siam, where it had travelled during the days of the Chōla conquests and got absorbed in popular lore.¹⁸

We have heard critics remark that Āndāl often lapses into indelicacy in expressing her longing for her divine lover.¹⁹ One who studies her poems deeply cannot agree with such a criticism. The words are uttered by Āndāl assuming the role of a gōṇī; it is certainly the ethereal and other-worldly longing of a love-sick damsel pining for the love of her lover. The theme is not wholly religious, it is partly religious and partly playful, Kṛiṣṇa is not merely the Supreme Being, the Transcendental One, but also the Immanent One, who can be a playmate and comrade. She is a real gopī, the role is not merely assumed. Many songs in Periyālvār and one in Kulasēkhara are to be studied in the background of Kṛiṣṇa's krīdā. The words spoken are set in a dramatic situation, and are placed in the lips of unlettered (and unsophisticated) āyār children. If we remember these three elements, namely, the immanence of Kṛiṣṇa, the drama, and the children of the āyār clan, the poem can never appear to be sensuous or un-womanly.

Her other songs are equally valuable. Her Tirumoli opens with a worship of Manmata the god of love, but the narration of her dream wedding with her Lord is the most important and the most lyrical of all her poems²⁰. The poem has got absorbed into the ritual of all the Vaisnava communities; it is even today sung at their wedding ceremonies. This is a beautiful lyric, narrating the details of the marriage ceremony. All the parts of the function are so graphically described by her that reading them, we even forget ourselves and imagine that we are actually in the midst of such a ceremony. The Vaisnavas are really fortunate to have such a poem. We can go on choosing such poems and introducing them—her address to the conch, to the clouds, flowers and birds. Two of the songs are on the traditional aḥam model.

Notes and References

- 1 Some traditions omit Madhura kavī (who was merely a bhakta of Nammalvar and not a bhakta of Bhagavan) and Andal (who was a woman) and say that the Alvars are only ten
- 2 The Pandiya Kingdom was under the rule of the Kalabhras at the time, and so the climate for devotional singing in any vaīdika religion did not exist there The Mudal Alvars of this period were born in the Pallava Kingdom, in the Saiva Canon, Karaikkal ammai and Tirumular of this period lived in the Chola Kingdom
- 3 In the Vaisnava Canon, [only Tiru Mangai, Tirup-Panalwar, Kulasekhara and Nammalvar are said to be not brahmīns, but in the light of this ayonija origin, there is no basis for holding these three also to be brahmīns
- 4 Vide Guruparamparai six thousand, the chapter on the three alvars
5. The penultimate poem in Mudal ayiram, beginning Amalanadīpiran
6. Vide Nan mukan Tiru-antadī (verses 2382-2477) in Iyal-pa and Tiru chanda viruttam (verses 752-871)
- 7 Verse 761
- 8 Both form part of Mudal ayiram, verses 917-926 and 872-916 therein
- 9 Cf verses 8 and 9 of Tiru malai (879 and 880) in Mudal ayiram
- 10 Verse 894, Ibid 11 Ibid 900 12 Ibid 719-729. 13 Ibid 677-687, 688-697 14 Ibid 730-740 15 The opening poem of Nalayiram, considered to represent the pranava OM to be prefixed to the entire Nalayiram 16 Ibid decads 3, 4, 5, 6 etc 17. Ibid 474-503 and 504-646
- 18 T P Meenakshisundaram, Sayamil Tiruppavarai - Tiruempavarai page 94 19 Jesudasan History of Tamil Literature 1961, page 107 Vide also the paragraph on Pavaip-pattu in the chapter, Minor Poems II 20 Mudal ayiram verses 556-566.

THE VAISHNA CANON - II

TIRUMANGAI ALVAR

Tirumangai ālvār is one of the two ālvārs who have sung a large number of verses and on a large number of shrines (86). The Periya Tirumoli or the second thousand is composed entirely of his songs. Besides this, there are three important poems of his in the Iyalpā also. Generally a picturesque and dramatic setting is given to the lives of the ālvārs and the story of Tirumangai is certainly the most picturesque of them all. He was a kallar (robber clan) chief of Mangai in Tiruvālinādu, near modern Sīkāli in Tanjāvūr district. He married Kumudavallī and at her instance began feeding thousands of bhāgavatas daily. When he was short of funds, he took to highway robbery. To test him, Viṣṇu with his consort appeared on the road as a newly wedded bridegroom and bride. Unable to remove the rings on His toes, Mangai applied his teeth to them. When even this failed, he asked the bridegroom, 'Have you cast a spell (mantra) over these?' He said Yes, and whispered into Tirumangai's ear the eight mystic syllables (astākāśra). Immediately, the erstwhile robber came under the influence of the Lord and straight away burst into song¹. The first song itself is very famous, it describes the learning of the Lord's name by the Ālvār and the conferment of all good thereby.

The total of his songs is 1253 verses. He has toured the entire Tamilnad. Quite contrary to tradition, his writings show considerable scholarship. His *Tiru Elukūrrirukkai*², like Sambandha's before him, has a very intricate number arrangement which only a good scholar could have mastered. He has sung two madal poems³, the smaller one and the larger one. The madal is a theme from the sangham poetry, there it is the male who threatens to ride the madāl, the palmyrah horse, out of a determination to give up his life through unrequited love, but here it is the woman, who is however strictly prohibited from doing so, according to the sangham tradition.

His Periya Tirumoli contains besides Tirumoli, two beautiful poems, Tiruk-Kuruntāndakam and Tiru Neduntāndakam.⁴ The first, a short one of 20 verses, is modelled on Tiru Nērisai of Appar, with shorter lines, and the second, a longer one of 30 verses, is modelled on Tiru Tāndakam of Appar, with longer lines. The latter poem, being longer in each line, has an easy flow of the subject, particularly in its verses 11 – 30, which are on the aham theme, the long drawn sound effect, the subject and the music all together confer on the poem a quaint and sensitive touch.

But by far the greatest work is of course his Tirumoli. The opening song is the one he sang when he came directly under the influence of his Master, Visnu; it is an outburst of ecstatic delight on being taught the Lord's name. The same delight in the name is expressed by him elsewhere also. One poem on Tiruvēṅkatam prays to the Lord fervently to accept him, in spite of his many imperfections, (beginning Tayē tandai enrum, 1028) is a very moving and haunting one. Like all the saintly singers everywhere, he says here that he has committed all sins, he cries that he is now surrendering himself to the feet of Venkatēsa and prays to Him to receive him and bestow His grace. (A critic, cursed with the bane of literalness, remarks that he counts murder, deceit and debauchery among his crimes. We are sad to note that he has altogether missed the spirit and the message of his poetry⁵) Another poem enumerates the occasions when He gave refuge to humble folk like Guha and prays that he also be accepted.⁶ Speaking of the Tīru Naraiyūr shrine, he says that this temple on a raised base was built by Kōc-Cengat Chōla, who had already built seventy similar temples for Śiva.⁷ One poem here on *sappāni*⁸ (asking the infant child to clap his hands) is on the pillai-Tamil pattern of Periyālvār. Another poem of short lines,⁹ is in the form of an entreaty by a lovesick maiden to the birds and other animals to call on the Lord to arrive here, it is on the model of Appar's *Tīru Angamālai*¹⁰ and is a delight to children, this is a poem on the love theme, most sensitive and poignant. There is also a sālal poem, a song of game for girls, which might have been a model for Mānikkavācaka's song of the same name, similar is also the kōttumbi poem.¹¹ The refrains like pongattam pongō and *'kulamanī dūram*¹² are perhaps reminiscent of the folksongs of the ālvār's kallar clan, their significance has been forgotten.

Considering the poems as a whole, one cannot but be impressed by their literary achievement.

There may not be great philosophical content in the songs, but their literary relish and their appeal as aham poems are immense. The appeal of childhood seems to be a favourite theme with all the Vaisnava poets, because of the immense scope in the portrayal of the Lord as the lovely child Kṛṣṇa, our ālvār is no exception.

Almost all his verses, seem to echo words, phrases, thoughts and patterns of the Śaiva Nāyanmārs.¹³

From the ālvār's allusions to the Pallava rulers of Kānci, it has been established that he was a chief under Dantivarman (775-825 A D).¹⁴ He has sanctified twelve small shrines round Tīru Nagaṛi, his place. He has also made many lavish endowments and added many structures to the Sṛī Rāṅgam temple. His name will always be associated with these two places.

NAMMALVAR

Lastly we go to Nammālvār. The story of Nammālvār is briefly told. He was the son of Kāṛi of Tīrukkuruhūr in the extreme south of Tamiḷnāḍ. Though he was born through the special grace of Viṣṇu, he kept dumb. His parents placed him under the *pul*i tree (tamarind, the sthala vrukṣa of the temple at Tīrukkuruhūr). The child would not see anyone except Him, and would not speak with anyone. Sixteen years passed. Madhura kavī came there directed by a divine light, and to him the ālvār opened his eyes and deigned to speak. It is said that the forms of Viṣṇu enshrined in the various temples in Tamiḷnāḍ and beyond appeared before the ālvār and he sang his songs on them.

He has sung four poems, Tiru Viruttam, Tiru Āsīryam, Periya Tiru Antādi and Tiru Vāymoli, giving out the substance of the four vēdas, Rīg, Yajus, Atharva and Sāma respectively. His poems are known among the Vaisnavas as the fifth vēda. His very name Nam-ālvār shows the endearment he had among them (Nam ālvār – our ālvār). He is the last of the ālvārs and the first of the ācāryas (preceptors). Nāthamuni is said to have taken instruction directly under him, not personally but by revelation, and continued the spiritual line going on to Ālavandār and Rāmānuja.

The first three poems contain 100, 7 and 87 verses respectively. They are grouped under Iyalpa. But his reputation rests on the last, Tiru Vāymoli (sacred utterances), which runs to 1102 verses. All the verses are in one antādi arrangement, the legend that all the forms of Viṣṇu in the various temples appeared before him to receive a song from him is understandable, from the fact of this antādi arrangement.

Tiruvāymoli is said to contain the essence of the philosophy of Vaisnavism, and that is said to be its greatness. It is the one basic scripture for Vaiṣṇavism, much more than the vēdas. Later preceptors and writers have extracted all their metaphysical and philosophical concepts from this book. The Vaisnavas derive great satisfaction in giving it a Sanskrit name such as the Dramīdōpanīsad, Drāvida vēda sāgaram and Drāvida brahma gīta.

His Tiru viruttam deals with love themes on the model of the earlier sangham aḥam poetry, on the religious plane. It sings of the soul's determination to break the fetters which bind it to matter, and expresses its yearning for union with God.

This ālvār's poetry enshrines the highest spiritual wisdom of the Vaiṣṇava cult and in this respect he occupies the same exalted position that Mānikkavācaka occupies in Śaivism. As poetry, the Tiruvāymoli is considered to be 'heart melting poetry, giving us the quintessence of divine experience'. His is not mere wisdom. It is a blend of wisdom, emotion, surrender and realisation. He has the god-vision in an extraordinary measure. All his senses perceive only God, it is always a direct realisation through absolute surrender. He often expresses this realisation in emotion-charged love lyrics. He addresses the world and gives out his message of love and hope, of surrender and joy in service. Attunement to the divine will liberates one even here, in this birth.

Many of his songs on the love theme are supremely poetic. There are indeed inspired poetic writing and brilliant flashes when he lays bare the inmost recesses of the heart pining for the love of the Lord. 'Art thou not mine own, little myna? I had prayed to thee to convey my all-consuming love to God, but thou didst not. I have now become weak and helpless through pining after him. Thou mayst go even now, and find some one who can feed thee as lovingly as I had done (so that I may pass away without any anxiety for thy future welfare).'¹⁵ What a poignant and intimate affection even towards a pet, born out of the intense love for God!

Poetic tradition in the Tamil language has been of a very high standard. There have been many ālvārs whose poems had conformed to those standards. Many of the poems of this ālvār also, following the love theme, hail in that tradition as great poetry. If tradition regarding his early life is to be credited, one cannot but marvel at the life-experience and love-experience which find expression in his songs. When one attains a spiritual oneness with the All-pervasive Being, an awareness of all experiences, spiritual, physical or emotional, accrues

MADHURA KAVI

Madhura Kavi, the last of the ālvārs, is remembered as the devotee who discovered Nammālvār. It is remarkable that he has been raised to ālvār-hood, though he has not sung a single line on Vīṣṇu: his ten verses¹⁶ are on his master Nammālvār, he even says that he knows no other god than Nammālvār. Yet such has been the discerning devotion of the Vaisnavas that his short poem forms part of their daily prayer book.

AMUTANAR

Amutanār, in the days of Rāmānuja, sang an antādi poem of 108 verses in praise of Rāmānuja. Its poetic and philosophic content was of such a high quality, that the ācārya included it, at the request of the Vaisnavas, in the Vaisnava canon, to bring up the total number of verses in the canon to four thousand verses. The antādi contains a number of verses of good lyrical quality. Its importance also lies in the fact that by its arrangement of the list of ālvārs, it sheds some light on their chronology also,

Periya Āccān Pillai has written commentaries on the entire Nālāyiram Tiruvāymolī of Nammālvār has been elaborated in the five commentaries known as the 6, 9, 12, 24 and 36 āyirappadī by different authors in different periods, the last is also known as the Īdu, the 24 is by Pillai Vedānta Dēsīkar, founder of the Vadakalai sect, has written a commentary on the short work of Tirup-Pānālvār. Others have also written additional commentaries on some other works.

Notes and References

- 1 Vide the section on this alvar in Guruparamparai, six thousand
- 2 Verse 2672 in Nalayira prabandham
- 3 Ibid 2673-74
- 4 Ibid verses 2032-51 and 2052-81
- 5 Jesudasan (book quoted) page 112. He goes on to say further that it is quite credible that as a prince he was responsible for bloodshed and lived a life of sensuality from which he sought deliverance. The remarks of the writer here are quite off the mark. Tirumangai was chief of a kallar (robber) clan. He fell in love with Kumudavallī and married her. The kallas, through they committed highway robbery, had their own codes of ethical conduct: they never killed, except in battle, they were never untruthful, and they never misbehaved with women. It is amazing that the present author, a literary critic at that, tries to read the crimes of murder, deceit and debauchery into the words of the alvar himself. When Manikkavacaka says he is worse than a dog, we do not take him at his word, so also Tirumangai alvar.

- 6 Nalayiram 1418
- 7 Ibid 1505 The Saiva Saint Appar in the earlier century also mentions this fact - vide Adangal murai 6959
- 8 Nalayiram 1888-97 9 Ibid 1942-51
- 10 Adangal murai 4240-51. 11 Nalayiram 1678-87
- 12 Nalayiram 1858-67 and 1868-77
- 13 His two tandakam poems and poems on the same metre such as Periya Tirumoli 2 10, and 7.10, 8.1, 10.10 etc.
- 14 Nalayiram 1127 15 Ibid 2715
- 16 The last decad of Mudal ayiram

THE ITIHĀSAS

In Sanskrit lore, the Itihāsas, or grand epics, are considered to be three - the Rāmāyana dealing with the story of Rāma written by Vālmīki, the Mahābhārata dealing with the story of the Pāndavas and the Kauravas written by Vyāsa, and the Bhāgavata, the story of Krisna, written by several writers in several books. All these have been rendered into Tamīl at various stages in Tamīl literary history. They are supposed to deal with the avatārs of Viṣṇu and his exploits on the human level. There are several such grand epics in verse dealing with the exploits of Śiva, but they are all termed purāṇa. Epics usually are the exploits of human beings, Rāmā and Krisna have come down to the human plane and hence their exploits are itihāsa. But Śiva has not come down to the human plane, hence his exploits are not itihāsa. Only the Skanda purāṇa, though termed a purāṇa, yet holds a unique place as a grand epic or itihāsa. It has also been translated into Tamīl verse. We shall examine here such books of an epic character, available in translations of the hoary past. Itihāsa implies an old story (iti iha āsa, it was said so).

The Mahābhārata in Sanskrit is the largest epic poem in all world literature, the Iliad and the Odyssey of Homer, the greatest books of the West, are together just a tenth of the Sanskrit epic,

RAMAYANA

The Rāmāyana of Kambar is the most famous epic in all Tamil literature. It has been dealt with in a separate section. It is not a translation but an original work, fit to rank with the greatest books of the world. Besides the work of Kambar, we learn there were other Rāmāyanas in the venbā and the asīriyappā metres, written before the 9th century, but they were all lost. There is also a very large Rāmāyana venbā in the last years of the 19th century, modelled on Kambar.

MAHA BHARATA

The Mahābhārata has been associated with the Tamīlnad, from the beginnings of Tamil literary history. Muranjīyūr Mudināgarāya, of the first Tamil Academy, says that the Sēra prince, Perum-sōrru Udiyan Sēralādan fed both the warring forces of the Kauravas and the Pāndavas in the Mahābhārata war and earned his title, Perum-sōrru Udiyan, the Prince who undertook the great task of feeding.

Translations of the Mahābhārata had also been many. Many were translated under royal patronage, the patronage of the Pandiyas and the Chōlas, but they are not available. A post-sangham poet is always hailed as Perundēvanār who wrote the Bharata, his work is also lost. Another poet of the same name, contemporary with Nandivarman Pallava III of Kāncī, again wrote the Bhāratam in the venbā metre, it should have been quite a large work, but only a fragment of 800 verses is available. It is written in prose and verse, its prose being the earliest example of Tamil prose, excepting Iraiyānār kalaviyal urai. Its verses are of high poetic quality and the loss of the major part of it is indeed a great loss to Tamil literature. Another poet by name Aruṇilai Viśāka wrote the Bhāratam in Tamil under the Chōla patronage in the 13th century, it is also lost.

Villiputtūrar wrote the Bhāratam again in the 14th century in over 4300 verses in the viruttam metre, his verses are mostly in chandam, in a rhythmic liting type of verse. His book was so popular that he was hailed as Villiputtūr ālvār. His is not a complete work, he stops with the tenth parva (or canto). His delineation of the story is merely an abridged version, he does not translate the entire original. Many centuries later, two versifiers felt that Villi had condensed the Vyāsa Bhārata too much and had also left it incomplete. So they added thousands of verses to the text making it about 16,000 verses, and it is now called the Nallāp-pillai Bhāratam after one of them. Its poetic value is not much. Some others also in later days tried their hand at telling the Bhārata story, but all of them are very poor in performance.

Subrahmanya Bhārati took a scene from the epic, the Vow of Draupadi, and elaborated it into more than 300 verses of modern poetry. It is superbly lyrical and exquisitely dramatic, and portrays the spirit of modern India's struggle for freedom from the British yoke, it is just one scene and nothing more.

The Rāmāyana of Kambai and the Bhāratam of Villiputtūrar are not religious books, they are conceived and written as secular literature, although the stories are about the incarnations of Viṣṇu.

Though the books are entirely divergent in poetic quality, they are quite popular among all sections of readers

BHAGAVATA

The Bhāgavata, the story of Lord Kṛṣṇa, is not so There are two versions of the Bhāgavata, written by two writers, Sevvaic-Cūduvār and Arulāladāsar both of the 16th century, running to 4973 and 9147 verses respectively They were written as religious purānas and their poetic merit is not much At a time when purānas were immensely popular in Śaivism, these seem to have been written to propagate the Vaiṣṇava cult Incidentally they mention all the stories and legends connected with Viṣṇu including His other nine incarnations In this respect, these are a valuable mine of stories and legends of the Sanskrit literature rendered into the Tamil language in metric form They will continue to serve as encyclopædias in this field for years to come

KANDA PURANA

Kanda purāna of Kacciyappa Sivācārya, written two centuries earlier than these two, belongs also to the same category It is also religious purānic literature, extolling the exploits of Skanda, Lord Muruga, and is the only Śaiva epic type purāna of the class of the two Bhāgavatas It has 10345 verses in six books and has wielded and continues to wield a tremendous influence on the Śaiva people The Bhāgavatas were naturally modelled on this The Kanda purāna was written at a time when the Śaiva Siddhānta had been systematised as a regular independent school of philosophy and so it contains expositions of the system in the course of the narration of its story In places, it is good poetry and often it is verse of a very high order A century later than the Bhagavatas, Kanda purāna was abridged into a 1000 verses by one Sambandha Caranālaya, and this book also is quite popular with the Śaivas.

ETHICAL LITERATURE

Writers in the Tamil language, as in all the Indian languages ancient and modern, have been laying great emphasis on an ethical way of living, we have a rich crop of such literature from the ancient past down to the present century. The first and the greatest work in the field of ethical poetry is of course Kural. This has been dealt with in a separate chapter.

It had been the source of inspiration for similar ethical writing and a large number of minor books, large and small, came to be written after it. But the genius of Tiruvalluvar was such that no one dared to attempt his short verse form, the kural venbā metre. All later writers adopted the traditional and the slightly longer venbā metre, which had four lines.

Though this is not the place to mention it, a word about the Jñānakkural may be said here. Much later in point of time (12 centuries later), an Avvai wrote a short kural poem of 310 verses on the subject of jñāna or the path of release, it is a philosophical and yogic treatise. But since it is well known that Tiruvalluvar wrote only on the first three goals of life, aram, porul, and inbam, a literary convention had risen that Avvai's book, dealing with the fourth goal namely vīdu (liberation), formed a complement to Kural, the legend that Avvai was an elder sister of Tiruvalluvar has added weight to this tradition. But it is far from being a fact. Many separate treatises, large and small, have immediately followed in the wake of Kural.

NALADI

Among the group of the eighteen minor poems, the Kīlk-kanakku, are found eleven poems which are ethical and didactic in content. The main feature of these poems is that they were all sung in the venbā metre (except Mudumolikkāṇṇi which is in the āsiriyam). The foremost among the group is Kural. Chief among the others is Naladi nānūru, the four hundred quartains. The suffix ār in the popular name of the work, Nāladīyār, indicates the esteem in which it was held among the learned. The book is considered a joint production of many Jain monks and there seems to be considerable truth in the statement that it was salvaged from the river Vaigai, when these verses alone proved their literary worth in the religious disputation between the Saiva Saint Jñāna Sambandha and the Jains. The reference to Muttaraiyar in two verses in Naladi places the book in the middle of the seventh century and makes it no doubt contemporaneous with Jñāna Sambandha. The poems were collected together by Padumanār, many centuries later, and arranged into chapters on the model of Kural. There is not much continuity of thought or unity of the subject in the chapters, this is but natural, since they were merely an artificial later arrangement of isolated ethical writing. Nāladī makes no mention of God. It is entirely puritanic in nature and a strong vein of asceticism runs through the entire poem, as against the fulness and abundance, and the felicitous harmony of home life, extolled in Kural. Several verses in it are indeed of good poetic quality but it is generally thrown into the shade only by the predominant beauty and elegance, baffling crispness and powerful vigour of Kural

Kural speaks of a positive joy and an enjoyment of life, while Nāladī preaches a negation of life. Hence in any scheme of things which glorifies living, it cannot but take a subordinate position

PALAMOLI

Palamoli nānūru is modelled on Naladī both in its poetic diction and its subject content. Munrurai Araiyar its author was a Jain. In the last line of each of its four hundred verses, he has placed a short, crisp and telling proverb which has currency in popular usage even today. The proverb generally epitomizes the thought expressed in the other three lines of the verse. Though the inclusion of a proverb has imposed an additional stress on the versification of the poet, he has succeeded to a certain extent in evolving a tolerable amount of good poetry. The book is naturally a mine of purāṇic anecdotes and legends, which illustrate the proverbs.

NANMANIK-KATIGAI

Nānmanik-katigai is a shorter work of 103 verses, perhaps earlier in point of time than the two previous books. Its name suggests that it is a necklace of four gems strung together. It also signifies that each of its verses contains four statements. The poem is of considerable poetic merit, superior to Palamoli, it had given rise to several similar works which we shall notice further on. Many of its statements have passed into the folk-lore of the Tamils, such had been its great force and vitality. From a quotation in a venbā at the end of Silappadhikāram (chapter 20), it may be argued that Nānmanik-katigai is earlier than the epic, but since it is held that Silappadhikāra venbās are later additions, this point is not tenable.

THE OTHERS

Tirukadukam, Sirupanca mūlam and Ēlādi along with Innā nārpatu and Iniya nārpatu, are also ethical poems modelled on Nānman. The first three profess to make three, five and six statements respectively in each venbā, Tirukadukam makes some good poetry but the other two display much of artificial strain. Unlike Nānman, whose name suggests gems, the names of these three suggest three, five and six medical ingredients or herbs, the idea is that just as these ingredients help to keep the body healthy and to cure ailments, the thoughts in these books help man to have a healthy and ethical behaviour in life. Each of these poems evidently had been planned as one of a hundred verses which the first two now have, but Ēlādi has only 80 verses now.

Innā nārpatu and Iniya nārpatu, as their names indicate, contain 40 verses each, each verse having bitter truths and sweet truths mentioned in their respective verses. The first makes four statements in each verse. Iniya however has four statements upto its fifth verse and then has only three. All the statements are wise observations on life, many of them tersely and arrestingly told Along with two other poems Kār nārpatu and Kalavali nārpatu, the four together are known as the Four Jories

Two other books in the 18 Kilk-kanakku group are didactic in character - Mudumoluk - kāñji and Ācārak-kōvai The first book contains so to say ten verses, where each verse is of ten lines again, each line mentioning a particular kind of truth or observation on life The ten verses deal with things superior, which can be known, things which are not to be ridiculed, which will not prosper, which are not what they profess to be, are the worst, are false, are easy, are poor and are never ignored Each thought is expressed in a single line of four feet, having an internal rhyme and alliteration and as such it easily arrests the imagination Each line in the verse has the same ending The poem has inspired later similar works such as Konrai vēndan and Verri-vērkai in distant centuries.

Ācārak-kōvai strikes a different note It lays down a semi-spiritual course, which disciplines the individual and teaches him good manners and good conduct in life. It is also a poem of a hundred venbās but its venbās are often of three lines and occasionally more than four also Its concern is the good behaviour of the individual in the home and in society, and also hygiene and sanitation in society Scholars have sought to establish that the author had taken his ideas from the smṛtis,¹ this is not correct Āgamas existed long before the smṛtis, the Upanisads and the Āgamas are two branches from the same stem, the Vēdas Many of the thoughts of the Ācārak-kōvai on hygiene and good manners are no doubt reminiscent of the Āgamu thought. Most of the thoughts of the poem have full relevance even today, after twelve centuries of its writing

AVVAI

With Ācāra-kovai, we take leave of the ethical elements of the Kīl-k-kanakku and now skip through the later centuries. The most popular and prolific writer of ethical maxims is Avvai, the most revered and loved poetess of the 12th century. Her Āttisūdi and Konrai vēndan state the eternal truths and the perennial wisdom of ages in the most cryptic language. They are so simple and real, so artistic and homely, that almost all the lines have passed into the folklore of the Tamil people. Āttisūdi consists of 108 short lines, arranged in the alphabetical order, each line having only two feet. Here the author lists all rules for an upright and useful life in society. Often she summarises in one line or two words, what Kural says in one couplet. Konrai-vēndan belongs to the same order, of 91 single lines of four feet each, having a melodious internal rhyme. Though crisp, the lines have a superior poetic quality in them. Though they remind us of Mudumolīk-kāṇṇi, they are freer and happier, because here there is no monotony of the need to conform to a central theme. Each line is a jewel, well cut and polished and set.

Equally popular are two other poems of Avvai, Mūdurai and Nalvai, of 30 and 40 venbās each, they are, in general, observations on life and speak of moral truths, instructive for the young and the old alike; the first is more general in content, while the second lays greater emphasis on karmā and spiritual matters The two poems serve as introductions to the study of poetry by the young in the primary standards of our schools

OTHERS IN VENBA

It is remarkable that the venbā metre has been chosen as the best form for moral instruction verses, throughout all the centuries beginning even from Kural Right up to the 19th century we find almost all didactic and ethical literature written in this metre. Araneric-cāram, the longest poem of this type after the three Kīl-kānakku works Kural, Nāladī and Palamolī, was written in the 13th century by a Jain author. It has 226 venbās and some of them are in simple and telling language, dealing with ethics of a general nature Prince Ativīrarāma Pandīya wrote his Naruntohai (other wise known as Verrī-vērkaī), as short aphorisms on the model of Avvai's Konrai-vēndan. Kumara gurupara swamī wrote his Nītneri viḷakkam in 100 verses epitomizing some of the thoughts in Kural Nannerī of Swamī Sivaprakasa is a shorter poem of 40 verses A wave of ethical writing seems to have surged though the centuries and these two books are the best specimen of the writing of the politically uncertain period, between the downfall of the Chōlas and the Pāndīyas and the rise of the European power in the south Two other poems of unknown authorship also require mention here Nīti venbā and Nīti sāram have each 100 verses The former tries to imitate the earlier classical writing, depicting observations on life with a well known imagery, while the latter is in the viruttam metre, and is mere verse, without any claim to poetry But yet the two had been popular even with the uneducated people in the last century.

Vivēka cintāmaṇi, a collection of more than one hundred verses of a didactic nature is a very late anthology of stray verses, containing some forceful observations of worldly wisdom, it however contains many statements decrying woman, it is more a jumble than a systematic collection. Again, Nīti nūl by Munsif Vēdanāyakam Pillai is a similar ambitious composition on moral instruction, very clever but not poetic. New Attisūdi of the national poet Bhārati is a short work on the lines of Avvai's poem, written with the stinging patriotism of a revolutionary fighter.

SATAKAM and KURAL VENBA

Two other types of poems may be mentioned here. The śatakam poems of which we have more than a score are small pieces of 100 verses each, generally in the very long viruttam metre, with a refrain praising some local deity in the second half of the last line, and containing in the other lines observations on life and living. They have had immense popularity till the first quarter of the 20th century. Till recently young children knew them by rote, they served as an introduction to poetry and literature to the young mind. Though the verses were long, they were adapted to singing and so were easy to memorize. They also helped to keep alive many social traditions and conventions in the minds of successive generations, because a memorization of at least half a dozen satakams was considered necessary for a beginner in literature.

The other type is the Kural venbā poem, each verse of which sought to illustrate a Kural, reproduced in its last two lines, with incidents taken from the purānās and the popular legends and stories and narrated in the first two lines. There are many such poems but they are all extremely laboured writing and they have never had any popularity, except to the extent that they strove to popularise Kural. Such a poem has also exercised a Gandhian mind. Rāya Cokkalingam, a Gandhian and a respected scholar of the 20th century, has written such a poem where the first two lines are addressed to Tiruvalluvar himself, who supplies his answer in the next two lines taken from his own Kural :

Public morals and private, being what they are, pointing to a downward trend, good souls will continue to go on with their preaching for a clean and honest way of life

Ethical writers had always concerned themselves with the impermanence of this life, of its youth and riches, and had enjoined man to lead a life of righteousness and love. In the depth and soundness of wisdom, in crispness and arresting expression, in the love of man and the eagerness to serve him, none can equal Kural and Avvai's two single-line works. There is nothing more to be said and no one can say it better than these but, mankind being what it is, poets will go on repeating the same truths and observations again and again to the end of time.

CONCEPT OF ETHICS

A few words may be said about the concept of ethics in general in the early periods of Tamil literature which we are discussing here. The goal of life is four-fold - aṛam, poruḷ, inbam and vīḍu (dharma, artha, kāma and mōksa in Sanskrit), meaning virtue or righteousness, prosperity or objectives of existence, happiness and final liberation. Of these we have seen that Kural has laid its emphasis on the first three, implying that final liberation and the bliss resulting therefrom, will naturally accrue through a rightful fulfilment of the first three. It is not correct to say that, as some seem to hold, the impact of Jainism and Buddhism on Tamilian society in the early centuries was partially responsible for the awakening of the ethical consciousness. Viewed from the Brahministic point of view, it may perhaps be argued with a certain amount of truth, that these two religions were reformist in character and had helped to do away with the animal sacrifices in the vedic religious practice. It is not so true with regard to the indigenous Tamilian society and religion. A mere perusal of Pura nānūru and Kural will indicate that the ethical truths propounded therein are all of a native character and have no element of borrowing or adaptation. The insistence on the qualities of valour and chivalry, and the adoration and high status given to women in general, are enough to disprove any theories of borrowing. There is no space here to dilate on this subject.

The foundation of Tamilian ethics was a universal brotherhood of the human species, irrespective of clan or clime and a purity of the individual, physical and spiritual, this included purity in thought, word and deed.

Anger, lust, untruth and greed stand condemned. Though the real ascetic life is held in great reverence, the householder's life is greatly extolled, because it is the foundation for all social living. Man and woman, leading a happy life together, helping others, particularly the ascetics, and begetting children, is said to be the ideal life. However, a righteous conduct for both, not because of the fear of sin, but for its own sake, the spirit of giving to the needy irrespective of whoever it may be, are the most praised virtues. The dignity of labour is always emphasized. Friendship, avoidance of bad company, filial duty, respect to elders, kindness to the meek and a general cultured and generous behaviour make for a respectable man. Ignorance, illiteracy, meat-eating, greed, and intolerance stand condemned. The limitations of birth are overcome by one's own effort, conduct, sense of justice and achievement. Although the transcendence of life, youth and riches have been preached by many, the core of the general ethical teaching is not the negation of life, but the enjoyment thereof for nobler and righteous purposes. Allegiance to the one Higher Transcending Power is emphasized by all.

Thus the general trend of the ethical code laid down by the ancient books may be seen to be of a universal character, and applicable also to the modern times.

References

- 1 S. Vairapuri Pillai, Ilakkıya manımalai 1954, pages 101-6
2. Gandhık-kavıtar, 1969 Section 2, Gandhiyum Valluvarum

DEVOTIONAL POETRY

Philosophy runs in the veins of the Indian, and more so of the Tamilian. No wonder therefore that we find a supplication to the Supreme Being made by poets from the earliest known period of literary production. In the absence of positive evidence, the modern scientific mind may not believe that that Being, in the name of Irāyanār, presided over the three Tamil Universities. Among the available literary material, Tiru Murugārruppadaḥ is the earliest poem in praise of a deity, here Muruga the Lord of the hills. Whether the poem was devotional poetry is no longer a question now, because there are thousands of devotees reciting it today before Muruga in the temples. But devotional poetry has always in it the element of music or singing, not merely reciting, this can be seen in the songs in praise of Muruga and Tīrumāl (Viṣṇu) in Paripādal, where the name of the poet, the name of the tune, and the name of the music master who wrote the notation therefor are given. Silappadhikāram contains many musical pieces in praise of Muruga, Viṣṇu, and Śakti as Korravai. Not only music but simplicity and easy understandability are the keynotes of any devotional poetry; all these elements are lacking in Tiru Murugārruppadaḥ.

EARLY POETRY

Tiru Murugārruppadaḥ sings the glory of Muruga and His camps or shrines and the divine grace that He bestows on His devotees, though the verse is terse and difficult, yet there is an element of directness and straightforward narration which could not be found in later devotional poetry. Paripādal contains some very lofty and sublime thoughts, which are still a wonder to find in the poems of those ancient days. Kaduvan Ila-Eyinaṇār who has sung on both Muruga and Tīrumāl, sings on Muruga 'My Lord Muruga, decked with the kadamba flowers, we crave of you, not riches or gold, nor the pleasures of life, but three things else – bestow on us Your Grace to lead us on to final release, grant us devotion to you, and the righteous conduct that accrues from both' ¹ This concept, namely the one of beseeching God to grant not material welfare, but His Grace and liberation from births, has been the only prayer of all devotional outpourings of all the saints and poets, Śaiva or Vaiṣṇava, in the entire range of later literature, from the sangham age to this day

THE FIRST SAINTS

The centuries 3 to 6 saw the evolution of the first Saints in both Śaivism and Vaiṣṇavism, who sang devotional hymns which have been collected into the canons of the respective systems. Tirumantiram of Tīrumūlar and the songs of Karaikkāl Ammai in Śaivism, and the three Antādis of the first three Ālvārs, Poyhaḷ, Bhūtam and Pēy in Vaiṣṇavism, belong to this period. Tīrumūlar's book is more in the nature of an esoteric philosophy than of prayer, while all the others are real ecstatic outpourings of a god-soaked heart. Even today, after a thousand and five hundred years after they were written, they move us to tears of joy and give us comfort and solace, and raise us to ethereal heights of peaceful bliss All of these are written in simple language without any involved or complex imagery or construction These saints generally never stop to criticise other sects, they are content with the joy which the thought of their Lord evokes in their hearts, their heart is so full that there is no room there for cold reasoning or for criticism The devotion of these saints was one of total surrender and self-effacement, like the wonder of an innocent child at an immediate experience We do not know even the natural names of these three Vaisnava saints and even Tīrumūlar, and Ammaī, though her name was Punitavati, came to be called only as Ammaī, the Mother

THE NAYANMARS

We are now entering into the most creative period in both the religions from the point of view of devotional literature All the Vaisnava saints and all the Śaiva saints, except those mentioned before had lived in the period from 600 to 900 A D The lives of the Śaiva Saints and the Vaisnava Ālvārs are well known in the land to require any detailed account in this short survey Jñāna sambandha of Śikali, Appar of Tīru Āmūr and Sundara of Tīru Nāvalūr toured the length and breadth of the Tamil country and visited all the Śiva shrines and so stirred up the religious fervour of the people, as had not been done in any other period, before or after, in Tamil literary or religious history Their impact on the people was all round Temple building activity commenced on a vast scale; literary output assumed newer dimensions, music had a new lease of life, religion and philosophy came alive into the lives of the people at all levels. All branches of the fine arts were activated afresh. A new ethical and spiritual code seemed to have been laid down to govern public morals. Society came closer to an almost classless religious integration. Māṅkavācaka and the lesser canon writers complete the list of the Śaiva hymnologists. The hymns have been dealt with separately.

THE ALVARS

The Vaisnava canon, both in substance and in time, runs parallel to the Śaiva. The Ālvārs are twelve and their songs number about 4000. They have moulded, more than the Śaiva canon has done, the life and ambitions of the Vaisnava people in the land, more particularly the Śrī Vaisnava brahmins. Rāmānuja by about 1100 A. D. and Vēdānta Dēśika by about 1300 A. D. had breathed new life into that community so much so that the lives of very large sections of that society are bound up with the temples and temple rituals. In most cases, the Vaisnava canon had invaded the home, and even all domestic and social rituals are performed to the accompaniment of the songs. Such an intensive fusion had not been effected by the Śaivas who had remained more austere and less emotional.

THE OTHERS

The culmination of the Śaiva canon is the Periya purāṇam, the metric biography of the Śaiva saints written under Chōla patronage. It is a string of stories of the highest devotion to Śiva and the book itself is a work of absolute devotion and surrender to God, unequalled in the whole range of Tamil Literature. The dotting of the Tamil country with hundreds of gigantic temples in granite – a feature not known anywhere else in India and in the whole world too, – is due to the impact of the devotional songs of Śaivism and the Periya purāṇam on society. People named their children, boys and girls after some happy expressions in the canonical songs.² Scanning through the centuries we find a rich legacy of devotional songs handed down to us age after age. Vināyakar ahaval by Avvai of the 14th century is widely memorised even today. It is closely followed by the three Karuvaṇ antādi poems of a Pāṇḍiya prince, one of which is also known as the Kuṭṭi (or minoṭi) Tiruvācakam, Porūr Sannidhi murai of Cidambara swami and Kandar kalivenbā of Kumara gurupara. Among the Vaiṣnavas the most marvellous piece is Satakōpar antādi (12th century). In praise of Nammālvār, it contains some very elegant and beautiful verses, the poem is also a rare challenge to Sanskrit, which the real Vaiṣnava would fain relegate to the background in preference to Nammālvār's Tamil. This is a very unusual position, and it speaks volumes for the Vaiṣnava's love of Nammālvār.

ARUNAGIRI NATHA

The greatest figures in later devotional literature are three – Arunagiri nātha, Tāyumanavar and Rāma-linga, and they are also immensely popular to this day. There are groups, among the elite and among the unlettered, which are moved to ecstasy by the songs of these masters, as by no one else.³ Arunagiri nātha needs no introduction to any Tamil group in India or abroad His Tiruppuhal, is the most widely known of his compositions There is such a revelry in metre, in chandam, in rhythm, and even in the ecstasy of the subject matter, that he will live in the hearts of man as long as the language lives The variety of his rhythmic pattern is unequalled and very vast. Condemnation of the lure of woman occupies a large part of his songs no doubt, but yet his religious zeal and supplication to God, and the joy and peace emanating from the songs, far outdo that element. Sanskrit words vie with Tamil in coming to his aid for the expression of ideas and for setting forth the rhythmic pattern and he is a great master in judiciously using both to create the lilting effect that is the mark of his Tiruppuhal To him Muruga is the Supreme God who dwells in all the temples and who comes to the succour of his devotee at all times 'The singer of the Tiruppuhal shows no reverence to the others' has become a proverb He has perpetuated the legend, incorrect perhaps, that Sambandha is an incarnation of Muruga

Tiruppuhal by its variety of rhythm, movement and magic of word pattern, and immensity of volume, has eclipsed his other works, but they also deserve equal attention if not more His Tiru vahuppu numbers about 25 long songs equalling Tiruppuhal in rank. Kandar anubhūti, a short poem of 51 short quatrains is the essence of his mystic experience

But his Kandar alankāram, in 106 verses, is a much simpler poem, breathing courage and hope to all mortals. The faith in God voiced here will make even the most despondent go through life bravely, and confidently meet any challenge in life. There is no poem in the language which will infuse faith and courage in young children as firmly as Kandar alankāram. It is mostly in very simple language and many of its verses laugh at Death. These two smaller poems are as popular as Tiruppuhal itself.

By about the days of Arunagiri lived many Siddhas who had also poured forth their thoughts in their stirring songs, but these are expressions of their esoteric philosophy, where the element of outward devotion is absent.

TĀYUMANĀVAR

Tāyumānavar on the other hand hails in the tradition of the Śaiva Nāyanmārs, the authors of Dēvāram and Tiruvācakam. He lived a thousand years after them. His is a mature and sober mind which sees God in everything around and hesitates even to pluck a flower for worship, because it sees God in the flower. He unwaveringly preaches the modern one-world concept, that mankind is one, philosophies and God are one. He is a well read man, a profound scholar, he was a minister under the Nāyaks but renounced that life. But he has no use for scholarship and higher philosophy in his scheme of the values of life, in his preparation therefor, and in the struggle to attain his goal of a universal vision and oneness with the all-pervasive One. He has no use for the body and the pleasures of the senses but he does not heap abuses on them, as many others had done. He always offers his mind as the sacrifice, at the altar of the temple the heart, his love as the holy bathing water, his spirit is the food newēdya, his intellect the incense and lamp, the deity is the God of Peace. He always seeks to effect an external harmony of the various sects like the Vēdānta, the Siddhanta and the Siddha, as well as an internal harmony of love to God and to all creation. He preaches also a philosophy of compassion; he enjoins man to look on every being as God Himself and give it the love he would give to God. Tāyumānavar was a great master in the use of Sanskrit, and although he uses a large volume of Sanskrit words occasionally, the use is not oppressive, there is force and vigour, and a directness, simplicity and aptness which make us forget the language and melt in their meaning. Tāyumānavar preaches a higher philosophy, which soars higher than rituals and temple worship, and he will have the greatest appeal for the thinking mind, be it unlettered or highly learned, for all time.

No Vaisnava poet of later days has risen to the stature of Arunagiri or Tāyumānavar.

RAMALINGA

Rāmalinga, coming a little more than a hundred years after Tāyumānavar, holds up the banner of compassion and has given his life to that philosophy. In the long history of devotion among the Śaiva fold which includes such illustrious names as Appar, Mānikka vacakar, Arunagirinatha and Tāyumānavar, Rāmalinga does have a place, but he does not follow in the footsteps of the first three but follows in the footsteps of Tāyumānavar. His doctrine of compassion and of the good life are the direct legacy of Tāyumānavar. His concept of the one-world embraces within its fold not only mankind but also the animal and the vegetable kingdoms. He had seen in his days poverty and hunger all around him and he believed with Gandhī that God appears before the hungry in the shape of bread. Among all the god-inspired souls, he is the one who also founded institutions for poor feeding.

THE OTHERS

Worship of Śakti, just like the worship of Vināyaka and Kumāra, had been there in Tamiḻnad, running parallel to the worship of Śiva. Ambikarmālai of Varagunarama Pandiṃya and Abhirāmi Antādi of Abhirāma Bhattar, in the 16th and the 18th centuries, are moving poems in praise of Śakti, but they are not to be mistaken to be relics of any Śākta cult in the land. Vināyaka, Kumāra and Śakti are worshipped as just manifest forms of Śiva and they do not constitute any separate cult.

Many persons had written devotional verses even in this century. Pamban swami was a gifted writer who produced a large volume of devotional verses in the first quarter of this century, all of them are on Muruga, he had a large group of followers here. He was fond of writing difficult verses, he was a good versifier. Tīru V Kalyanasundara Mudaliyar, the celebrated writer had also written devotional verses on all possible beings – the Hindu pantheon, the Jina, the Buddha, Allah, and Christ, but they stop with being mere verses. His love for the one-world concept was great, he has been responsible for indirectly making it a fashion among writers to express homage to sects other than the vardika.

So the cry of the devoted heart goes on. It is echoed in our own day in the variety of songs by the national poet Bhārati, in whose songs we find the inspiration of the hymnists and Arunagiri, of the Siddhas, of Tāyumānavar and Rāmalinga. It will continue to be heard, in spite of any amount of ungodly trends, to the end of time.

Notes and References

- 1 Paripadal 5
- 2 Vide such proper names found in inscriptions, as Tarunendu sekharan (from Appar), Sirudaikkalal (from Sundarar), Niran pavalakkunram, Malalai silambu and Edutta padam (from Tiruvisaippa) and Maruta manikkam (from Pattinattar)
3. The singing of Tiruppuhal mani (the term of endearment by which was known T. M. Krishnaswami Aiyar, a senior and prominent member of the Madras Bar and the Chief Justice of the High Court of a South Indian state for some time), will be fresh for ever in the ears of those who had the good fortune to participate in his bhajans at the Vadapalan Subrahmanya temple near Madras, just a quarter of a century ago. All classes of the people, men and women, young and old, rich and poor, cultured and illiterate, were moved to raptures over his singing, and rare indeed was the person who did not dance at his bhajans.

THE COMMENTARIES

Commentary writing constitutes an important feature in the growth of Tamil Literature. The 10th to the 15th centuries may be seen to be the most productive periods in this field. Commentaries have been written both on literary works and on grammatical treatises. The largest number of writers have written commentaries or annotations on Tirukkural among the literary works, and on Tolkāppiyam among the grammatical works, in both the types, the commentaries on these two have been the earliest.

KALAVIYAL URAI

Iraiyānār Kalaviyal is an exception to the last statement. A legend says that Lord Sōmasundara, i e, Śiva enshrined in the temple at Madurai, sympathized with the desire of the Pāndiya prince there about the need for a grammatical treatise on the subject of porul and so caused Iraiyānār Kalaviyal, a book of 60 aphorisms on the subject to be found under His seat in the temple. One Nakkīrar (not the sangham poet) had written an elaborate gloss on it and this has been hailed ever since as a model of excellent prose writing. Probably the text and the gloss were composed in the 8th century A D and, after two centuries of oral transmission, were reduced to writing. This gloss is the earliest specimen of prose writing we have, it is even more valuable than the text. We get a legendary account of the earlier sanghams which existed at the submerged South Madurai and Kapātapuram, only from this commentary, this account was later incorporated by Adiyārkkunallār in his commentary on Silappadhikāram. The Kalaviyal commentary is in a very rich and picturesque language, mostly a form of poetic prose, full of alliteration, assonance and rhyme, in long drawn out sentences. But yet it is very dramatic, studded with similes and metaphors, yet direct, full of grace, clear and lucid though complex, very descriptive and ornamental. It is no doubt good reading, although it is a laboured and ornate writing. An unwholesome outcome thereof was that most of the early Tamil scholars of the end of the 19th century and the first quarter of this century imagined that that was the ideal prose style and tried to imitate it, with the result that all their writing resulted in a stilted, highly artificial, pedantic and unreadable language.

VALUE OF THE COMMENTARIES

The greatest contribution of the commentators as a whole is that they helped to preserve many a work, be it grammar or pure literature, from extinction. But for their attempts to elucidate the texts, the texts themselves might have passed into oblivion long ago. This will be very clear from even a casual glance at the list of the large volume of the literature quoted by them. They mention many pieces of literature which had been irretrievably lost before them. And we know today that quite a large body of literature which was available in their day has since been lost. Besides, they have preserved the literary and social traditions and conventions, customs and ideals, idioms, words and their significance, of a period a thousand years ago, and had re-captured in their writing the atmosphere of those even a further thousand years earlier, and have handed them down to us. Thus in a broad sense they have helped to maintain the continuity of the language and its literature. But for their zeal and their reverence for the earlier literature, we would have been left with only the purānās and the prabandhas of the last five centuries, the earlier literature – Ettuttoḥai, Pattuppāttu, Silappadhikāram etc – would have perished, as similar other early works had perished.

TOLKAPPIYA URAI

Commentaries by Ilampūranar and Naccinārkkiniyar are available in full¹ for the three books of Tolkāppiyam, that of Pērāsiriyaṉ for only the end part of Book Three. Six commentaries have been written on the second book dealing with words and etymology.² Of all the commentaries, that of Ilampūranar is the simplest. He deserves to be called the Discoverer of Tolkāppiyam, because when Tolkāppiyam had become obscure through suppression by Kalabhra rule at Madura, necessitating a new grammar by name Iraiyānār Kalavīyaḷ to be composed, Ilampūranar, a few centuries later, discovered Tolkāppiyam, studied it and expounded it with great pains and gave it a new lease of life. Naccinārkkiniyar's commentary is the most elaborate and scholarly, but heavily weighted with citations from early literature and with his own idiosyncrasies. The commentary by Sēnāvaraiyaṉ on the second book is considered to be the most original and the best on that book.

GRAMMAR

We shall take up the commentaries on the grammatical treatises first. We have noticed the one on Irāyanār Kalaviyal. This was probably reduced to writing by Nīlakantanār in the 10th century. Yāpparunkala virutti and its Kārikai urai, each by a different disciple of the author Amīta sagara, deal elaborately with prosody, the subject matter of the texts. Yāpparunkala virutti gives as references and citations a list of authors and their works, which seems to be limitless and inexhaustible. We learn from it that not only many poems large and small were in existence before the 10th century, but that there were at least half a dozen schools of grammar and prosody which had evolved their own separate rules for verse-making, we do not hear of them anywhere else in literary history. To give an instance, there was one Avinayam by Avinayanār, which was obviously of a different school of thinking from Tolkāppiyam, and for which we learn a celebrated author, Raja pavitrap-pallavataraiyar³ had also written a commentary. Both the text and the commentary are of course lost. We also get a glimpse of the literary trends in the 8th – 10th centuries, when there were writers who had assumed the names like Agastya, Tolkāppiya and Nakkīra and that perhaps jealousies among them had caused many books to fall into disuse and later pass into oblivion. Gloss writing on grammatical treatises goes on to the end of the 15th century, Tolkāppiyam, Purap porul venbāmālai, Neminātam, and Nannūl are the chief books on which gloss was written. The work continues in later centuries also. We also find some authors like Nārkavirāja nambī and some writers in later days writing the commentary for their own works,

KURAL URAI

If commentaries on grammatical works bring to us obsolete and unfamiliar principles of language, etymology and poetics, those on literary works are equally important in giving us a peep into the life and culture, ideals and aspirations, pleasures and sorrows of the Tamil people of bygone ages. The many attempts⁴ at expounding the thoughts of Kural beginning from the simple writing of Manakkudavar culminate in the elaborate and classic commentary of Parimēlalakar. Though a few of his thoughts appear today unacceptable to some, there is no other writing which has brought out the glory and splendour of the classic of Tiruvalluvar as well as he has done.

ADITYARKKU NALLAR

A work of even greater importance to the very concept of Mut-Tamil is the commentary of Adiyārkkunallār on Silappadhikāram. The classification as Mut-Tamil has been dealt with in an earlier chapter. Silappadhikāram is the only Tamil work which deals with the three divisions of Tamil, Iyal, Isai and Nāṭakam (literary composition, musical composition and drama), and Adiyārkkunallār, following in the footsteps of the earlier glossary writer,⁵ reveals to us a glorious vista of an earlier period when the two divisions of Tamil, music and drama, flourished in all their splendour, they had a vast literature, and many manuals laid down the rules for the musicians and the instruments, for the dance, drama and acting. But for the casual illustrations provided by him, posterity could never have known the wide extent and the deep emotional content of this vast body of literature. Nallār also gives the story of the first two sanghams in full,

NACCINĀRKKINIYAR

But the greatest writer of commentaries and the most voluminous writer is Naccinārkkiniyar. He has annotated Tolkāppiyam in its entirety,⁶ and has also annotated the whole of Pattup-pāttu, Kalit-tohai and Cintāmani.⁷ As one who has tackled both general literature and grammar, he was a master with no equal, and in the volume of citations which he gives he is unrivalled. Naccinārkkiniyar along with Adiyārkkunallār is remarkable for the pains he takes to give posterity a peep into the past, into the literature and life of the past, most of which had become extinct.

Naccinārkkiniyar seems to have been a living encyclopædia of language and literature in his day. Like all the great gloss writers, he also had great reverence for the writers of the texts. It was the religion of the commentators not to let down the authors, this we find in a large measure in his gloss on Cintāmani. The discerning reader will find that but for his gloss, the book least deserves the acclaim it has had, Naccinārkkiniyar has corrected the author in several places. Besides grammar and general literature, he was equally familiar with other writing such as astrology, botany, zoology and medicine.

THE OTHERS

A word may be said about the unique commentary on Tiruk-kōvaiyār by one Perāsiriyaṟ,⁸ who is different from the Tolkāppiyam commentator. This writer gives a very useful commentary, considering the kōvai as a work on the aham theme on the model of the sangham poetry. The uniqueness of the commentary lies in the fact that of all the Tirumurais in the Śaiva canon, only this poem of 400 verses, said to be part of the eighth canon, has earned a commentary

All the sangham poems have commentaries of varying merit; the 18 Kīlk-kanakku also have been written on, some commentaries are very valuable while some others are not so ⁹

There have been many lesser lights in this field and, often we find in later days, many purānās and similar writing always annotated, as an instance may be mentioned Sivadharmōttaram and Arunācala Purānam, all of whose manuscripts exist as text and commentary. These had acquired a religious importance which necessitated their simplification in prose for the understanding of the masses and hence their annotation.

A few words on the maṇḍpravāla commentaries are mentioned in the chapter on Vaiṣṇava literature.

Notes and References

1 The commentary of Naccinarkkiniyar for three chapters of Book 3 (meṇḍpadu, uvamam and marapu iyal) are not available

2 Six commentaries on the second book of Tolkappiyam have been printed, only two for Books one and three

3 Vide Nannul, commentary by Mayilai nathar

4 Ten commentaries are said to have been written on Kural, five have been printed vide Tirukkural Uraikkottu edition published under the auspices of the Kaṣi Mutt, Tiruppanandal,

5. The glossary and Adiyarkku nallar's commentary have been beautifully edited and published by Dr Swaminatha Ayyar, 1892, third edition 1927. The name of the gloss writer is not known.

6. Though his commentary on three of the concluding sections of the third Book of Tolkappiyam are not available, that of Perasiriyar for this portion is available.

7. The world of Tamil students should certainly feel grateful to Naccinarkkiniyar for this commentary but for which Cintamani would not only be obscure, but would also appear to be a poor composition.

8. Vide the edition published under the auspices of the Kasi Mutt, Tiruppanandal, 1960, which gives an earlier gloss and Perasiriyar's commentary.

9. For an exhaustive account of these commentaries, vide pages 119-149 of my History of Tamil Literature, 13th century.

ŚAIVA LITERATURE

DEVOTIONAL WRITING

We deal in this section only with the Śaiva religious literature. The Śaiva canon and the other Śaiva devotional poetry have been treated separately. During the period of about five centuries during which the ethical books of the 18 Kīl-k-kanakku came to be written, there have been parallel streams of thought which went deeper than mere ethics. We have here the beginnings of religious writing, both on Śiva and on Viṣṇu. We have noted earlier that the Śaiva and the Vaiṣṇava Canon had their beginning during this period. Tīrumūlar and Karaikkāl Ammaṭṭai lived during the centuries 3 to 5 and wrote their songs. It has to be noted here that while Ammaṭṭai is all simple devotion, Tīrumūlar's songs are not mere devotion but are all philosophical and mystic writing. His book is the only one of the twelve books of the Śaiva canon which is all philosophy and mysticism. The four Śaiva Acāryas, who lived during the 7th to the 9th centuries preached the bhakti cult, that of love and total surrender to God.

Acāra-kōvai, the last of the 18 Kīl-k-kanakku, shows considerable Śaiva influence and may be considered to have been composed after the three Śaiva Nāyanmārs had sung their Dēvaram.

Nambiyāndār nambi, called the Vyāsa of the Śaiva canon, is important, not only because he collected together the forgotten Śaiva hymns and arranged them into different books, but also because he caused the musical notations to be made for them with the help of a pāna girl

These paved the way for temple worship and gradually, when the Chōla emperors held sway over all the Tamil spoken areas, huge magnificent palaces for God in granite known as temples came to be built. The period of the Chōla supremacy is one grand epoch of Śiva worship. This had attained its zenith by the 11th century, by which time all wars were over and there was relative peace in the land, and there was no more scope for empire expansion, worship and ritual were at their maximum, followed to the level of a satiety, and now thinkers had time to turn their minds towards deeper thoughts. The three eternal entities, God, soul and matter, began to engage their attention and in time the Śastras came to be written in Tamil.

EARLY SASTRAS

Besides, there might have been the example of the Vaiṣṇava acāryas, Nāthamuni, Ālavandār and Rāmānuja, who wrote innumerable Sanskrit manuals laying down their own systems of philosophy and rituals, during the 9 – 11 centuries. Although these were in a minority, the Śaivas could not help being influenced by their dedicated work for their religion.

In such an atmosphere, the first philosophical writings of Śaivism are born. An important feature of the Śaiva writings is that they are all in Tamil, unlike the Vaiṣṇava writing of the period which was all in Sanskrit, are all original, and are all also good poetry. Unlike many secular writings, all these religious treatises are wholly available and elaborately annotated in the later centuries. There are three outstanding books, all written in the 12th century Jñānāmṛtam contains 75 verses in the āsīryam metre, dealing with the Śaiva philosophy. It is quite a laboured writing, written in a terse and partly archaic language, reminiscent of the sangham age, and its phraseology is also not of the general run of Śaivism. Tiru Undiyār, modelled on the poem of the same name forming part of Tiruvācakam, is written in a tālisaṁ metre of three lines. It is not a regular treatise but is an expression of the author's ecstatic and mystic experience. Tiruk-Kalīrrup-padiyār is a sort of metrical commentary on it in the venbā metre, and much larger. It mentions besides the thoughts contained in the original, many of the Śaiva legends of the servants of God which were current up to that period. These two books are hailed as the first two Śāstras of the Śaiva Siddhanta school of philosophy.

MEIKANDAR

It was given to Meikandār to collect all the philosophical thought contained in the Śaiva canon and crystallise it into a logical system of philosophy. He wrote this in the form of twelve short aphorisms defining the concept of God, the soul, the bonds and the means for release. He had also added a larger metrical illustration and explanation for the text and these together are known as Śiva jñānabōdham. The Śaiva philosophy has since come to be known as the Meikanda system. Many illustrious spiritual preceptors followed after him. His disciple Arulnandi wrote his Śiva jñāna siddhi, a very large metrical commentary on Śiva jñāna bōdham. Its first part of over three hundred verses is a refutation of the doctrines of fourteen alien schools of philosophy, beginning from the lōkāyata, and the second part a little longer, is a clear enunciation of the Śaiva point of view. Its verses are couched in beautiful poetic form, and reading it, one may even forget that he is going through an abstract philosophical treatise, but may enjoy it as a piece of pure literature. The Siddhi is a happy illustration of the statement that poetry lends grace to philosophy and philosophy lends weight to poetry.

Arulnandi's disciple's disciple Umāpati wrote many manuals, of which Śivaprakāśam and Tiruvarulṭṭayan, each of 100 verses, make good reading and introduce the reader to the Śaiva philosophy. The works of all these authors, fourteen in number, are together known as the Siddhānta Śāstras. In the years after them, many elaborate glosses have been written on all of them.

ŚAIVA SCHOOLS

Following in the spiritual line of these preceptors, there have been many illustrious writers who had expounded particular aspects of the Śaiva philosophy in their writings. Chief of them are Tattvap-prakāśa and Marayñāna Sambandha who had written valuable treatises. Other enlightened disciples and seers founded monasteries or centres of religious study and practice, in places such as Sūryanārkoil, Tiruvāvaduturai, Kancipuram and Dharmapuram, all of which exist today with varying degrees of importance and usefulness. These had been responsible for the production of a large volume of sectarian literature during the centuries 16 to 19. Their writing had generally proceeded on four lines. They are philosophical and religious treatises, commentaries, purāṇas, and devotional poetry.

Many are the philosophical manuals written by the preceptors in all these lines. The Śaiva pathway to God has been said to be four – the carya, kriya, yōga and jñāna mārḡas and many books have been written on each of them. Śivāgra Yōgi the founder of the mutt at Sūryanārkoil was a great genius who had written large tomes in Sanskrit and in Tamil. He wrote Śivanerip-prakāśa, a long poem of 215 verses, which explains many obscure points in Śaiva Siddhanta. He is the only writer in Śaivism to employ the manipravāla style, he has written a manipravāla commentary on Arulnandi's Siddhīyar. He has written many large Sanskrit treatises and all of them are great books in their respective fields. Guru Jñāna Sambandha, founder of the Dharmapuram Mutt, has written many minor poems on the Śaiva religion. Many works on Śaivism had been written both in this mutt and in the Tiruvāvaduturai mutt in the later centuries. The greatest commentary writer of all time is Śivajñāna swami of Tiruvāvaduturai, he wrote two commentaries on the Śiva jñāna bōdham, one is the larger Bhāṣya intended to emulate the Śankara Bhāṣya on the Brahma Sūtras, and the other is the shorter gloss. Both are valuable works in Śaivism. Most of the Siddhānta sāstras had given rise to several good commentaries. These are important both as expositions of philosophy and as models of contemporary prose.

OTHER POEMS

There has been a conscious attempt at recapturing the language and imagery of the sangham poetry, Kallādam reflects this attempt. This is a poem of 100 verses, short and long, in the āsuriyam metre dealing with some of the aham (love poetry) themes of the sangham age. The verses are in praise of Śiva at Madurai. The book is no doubt a good attempt, but its artificiality makes it a failure. The author had collected many an anecdote current in his time and they have helped later writers.

Dakka yāgaṇ parani of Ottakkūttar is a major Śaiva poem, though it is modelled like a war song, it really celebrates an exploit of Śiva. It is a remarkable poem, unequalled in its sound effect and rhythm, and in the audacious portrayal of the earth and the cosmos, of the human agency, and the world of goblins and ghosts and angels together, on the same canvas.

PURANAS

Śaiva purāṇas have been dealt with elsewhere. They have started relatively early in point of time, with Nambi Tiruvilaiādal, and go on down to the 20th century. Many purānas have been wholly translated in verse by the Pāndiya princes of the 16th century. Purānas on local shrines called sthala purānas have been written in hundreds, often running to thousands of verses, Māyūra Purāna has 6519 verses, while Tirunelvēli purāna, perhaps the longest, has over 9,000 verses. Kanda purāna in Tamil by Kacciappa Śivācārya was conceived on the model of Kambar's Rāmāyana in the epic style.

Periya purāna is the Śaiva hagiology, and many other lives of saints have also been written as purāna. The purāna by Kadavul-mā-muni, depicting the life of Saint Māṇikkavācaka is very unique, it is fully and wholly devoted to bhakti, without the least description of woman.

But the one later purāna which had attained the front rank of literature is easily Tiruvilaiyādal purāna of Paranjōti. There had been Nambī's earlier work on the subject and Paranjōti, singing on the same subject, namely the sports of Śiva at Madurai, barely two hundred and seventy five years ago from now, has achieved such poetic excellence that has called for the admiration of all critics. He writes in a simple language, without pomp or ostentation, and goes on with a straight forward narration. Occasionally, many philosophical truths of Śaivism are also interwoven into the narrative. But the evident devotional nature of the author lends a lyrical quality to his narrative, which is easily the best work among the later day Śaiva literary production.

OTHER WRITING

The Siddhas were revolutionaries from the Śaiva fold, they revolted from everything orthodox and ritualistic, they have left behind a substantial volume of good poetry, which employs the spoken language with power and banter to ridicule orthodox beliefs and customs, it had a tremendous effect on the masses.

One of the important contributions of Śaivism to literature is its later devotional poetry. Long after the Śaiva canon was compiled, devotional literature has been growing and we find later day poets offering large volumes of their songs as devotional tributes at the feet of not only Śiva, but Śakti, Muruga and Vināyaka. There are innumerable such poems, both merely as devotional offerings, and also as literary prabandha pieces. Eminent writers in this field are Kumaragurupara swami and Śivaprakaśa swami.

The musical pieces of Muttu Tāndavar and Gōpāla Kṛṣṇa Bhāratī are also devotional pieces of high lyrical quality, and charged with deep emotional fervour and passionate outburst.

Tāyumānavar and Rāmalinga swami complete the picture of later Śaiva literature. Rāmalinga swami was contemporary with Minaksi sundaram Pillai and Ārumukha navalar of the mid-19th century. While Rāmalinga wrote simple direct language coming from the heart, Pillai always wrote a laboured style, packed with complicated thoughts in complicated language. He is certainly the most voluminous writer of modern days. He has written a score of purāṇas and a hundred prabandhas Occasionally there may be easy readable verse in him, but on the whole he is heavy.

Ārumukha navalar is deservedly hailed as the maker of modern prose His work began with a purpose Hailing from Jaffna, he found that many of his own kith and kin embraced Christianity, lured by the bright education and opportunities for material advancement which the missionaries offered. He was sad, but he did not give in He felt that lack of early religious training was responsible for the young men being converted and so went about preaching and writing small Śaiva catechisms, even like the Christian missionary He was out to inform and convince, and so his style was always simple, direct and to the point, and went straight to the heart He was never verbose or heavy He wrote only on Śaiva themes and his language never failed in its appeal Many prose works were written by him and they are models of elegant prose, not only in the 19th century, but for all time.

POEMS ON OTHER DEITIES

One aspect of the development of Śaiva literature is the writing of poems on Śakti Poems on Muruga are found in Pattuppattu and in the 9th Book of the Śaiva canon, poems on Vināyaka in the 11th Book Songs in praise of Śakti are no doubt found in Silappadhikāram but separate poems are not found in early literature Kavirāja Pandita (16th century) has translated Soundaryalahari of Śankara into Tamil verse and, though it does not rank high as poetry, it was the precursor of many more writings in praise of Śakti. Sarasvatī antādi (12th century) and Sakala kalāvallī mālai

(17th century) are in praise of Sarasvatī. Varaguna-rāma Kulasēkhara Pāndiya's Ambikai mālai (16th century) and Kumara gurupara's Mināksi Ammai Pillai - Tamil are well known works in praise of Śakti, but Abhirāmi antādi (of the 18th century) was instantly popular and remains so even today. These songs have inspired the national poet Bhārati to sing his Śakti songs.

VAISNAVA LITERATURE

MANIPRAVALA

We have spoken about the Vaisnava canon in an earlier chapter. Here we shall say a few words about the Vaisnava works of a purely religious character.

The Vaisnavas revel in Sanskrit terminology¹ even for the names of their Tamil Saints. Maṭṭai is always Bhaktisāra, Āṇḍāl is Gōḍa, Nammālvār is Śāthakōpa and so on. It should be stated at the outset that the history of Vaisnava religious writing starts with two handicaps, one is that the theological writers had all without any exception written and encouraged the writing of only Sanskrit works, where they found this inadequate for their purpose, they invented an artificial and unnatural Sanskritic - Tamil prose style, known as the manipravāla (mixture of gem and coral) which is an unhappy mixture of Sanskrit and Tamil.² This style started with about ninety per cent Sanskrit and ten per cent Tamil in the 11th century, and ended up by the 16th century with fifty per cent Sanskrit and fifty per cent Tamil.

The second handicap was that the early Vaisnava Ācāryas had always to contend against the advaitins of the Śāṅkara school even from the days of Rāmānuja. The Śāṅkara school always swore by Sanskrit and so the Vaisnavas had also to swear by Sanskrit, if they were to voice any effective opposition.

to that school. This element completely conditioned the early Vaisnava thought and writing, and it partly explains the innovation of the manīpravāla.

The first writer to employ this manīpravāla style is Tīru Kurugaip-piran Pillān, disciple of Rāmānuja, who commissioned him to write an orthodox religious gloss on Tīruvāymoli of Nammālvār. It is called the Ārōyirappadi, gloss of six thousand granthas, a grantha being the equivalent of a couplet of 16 voiced letters in each line. The style of Pillān is a very difficult one, almost completely in Sanskrit. Apart from the fact that it advanced the cause of Rāmānuja's philosophical doctrines, it has not contributed in the least to the development of the Tamil language. But it had one significant result - four different manīpravāla commentaries were written after him on the Tīruvāymoli, the 9 thousand, the 24 thousand, the 36 thousand and the 12 thousand. These were relatively in easier manīpravāla. The 36 thousand, called the Īdu, being the largest, has been hailed as the source book of all Viśiṣṭādvaita (Vaisnava) philosophy and is the greatest contribution in elucidating the thoughts of Nammālvār.

But one thing should be noted. These manīpravāla commentaries are not commentaries in the sense of those we had earlier examined in the chapter of that name. The verses of Nammālvār here annotated by them, merely serve as pegs on which to hang their own ideas of religion, philosophy and purāṇic lore. All the thoughts the writers express cannot be deduced from the text. But yet their exposition is indeed interesting, enjoyable in their own right, and exhilarating.

The greatest commentator of all was Periya Āccān Pillai who wrote an elaborate gloss on the entire Vaisnava canon³ His exposition of Āndāl's Tirup-pāvai is deservedly the most famous.

GURU PARAMPARAI

An important section of the Vaisnava writing of the period is the Guru paramparai, an account in the manṇarāla style, setting forth the legendary stories of the Ālvārs and the Ācāryas (or the spiritual preceptors) of Vaisnavism Although the stories of the Ālvārs here narrated are mere legend, the part relating to the Ācāryas is almost fully historical and can be relied upon as an authentic chronicle of events, omitting exaggerations and narrations of miracles, which were a characteristic of the times It also unlocks a window for us on the day to day life in the spiritual brotherhood of the Vaisnava holy orders

MINOR POEMS

But these apart, Vaisnava literature does not appear to be a continuous stream of Tamil literary productivity It appears to have dried up after Nammālvār for a period of about two hundred and fifty years, till Amutanār composed his hundred verses (antādi) on Rāmānuja This poem has flashes of brilliant poetry and was included by Rāmānuja himself in the Vaisnava canon. A few years later a minor poet wrote the hundred verses (antādi) on Śathakōpar (Nammālvār) This poem also ranks high as good lyrical poetry, praising the ācārya

VEDANTA DESIKA

The above two are merely minor poems and there have been one or two much smaller pieces; but the main stream was dry again, till a versatile genius in the person of Vēdānta Dēśika appeared on the scene. He gave new life in his days to the Vaisnava sect and and from him Vaisnavam branched off into two different directions - the Northern, taking after him with headquarters at Kancipuram, and the Southern, from his contemporary Pillai Lokācārya with headquarters at Sri Rangam. The two sects had some doctrinal differences which the passage of time had only helped to widen. They are today as separated from each other as any two entirely unrelated religions can be.

Vēdānta Deśika was a towering personality who wrote a hundred manuals in Sanskrit and, very much unlike the general run of the Vaisnava ācāryas, wrote also twenty poems in Tamil. Probably he felt that without handling religion through the mother tongue, his new vadakalai could have no future. To the northern school of Vaisnavism, these have scriptural authority. Some of Dēśika's poems make good poetry couched in simple and lyrical language. Perhaps his only compeer in Vaisnavism can be Manavāla mā munigal, a century later than him, who has also written theological treatises both in Sanskrit and in Tamil. He is hailed as the great leader of the Southern school, the Periya Jiyar.

PURANAS

After the fall of the Vijayanagar dynasty, there seems to have been intense literary activity in all fields of Tamil writing. There was a sudden spurt of literary activity, which resulted in two Tamil renderings of the great Bhāgavata epic from two Sanskrit sources. They fill a gap long existing in the epics featuring Viṣṇu · the Rāmāyana and the Mahābhārata had been written in Tamil earlier, but not as religious purāṇas, but as literary epics The Bhāgavata was now done in Tamil, not as an epic, but as a purāṇa Sthala purāṇas, of which we have hundreds in Śaivism, are very scarce in Vaiṣṇavism. Two large books, Kūḍal purāṇa and Kuruhūr māṇṁṁyam were written in the 16th century, but their literary standard is poor.

OTHER POEMS

Pillai-perumāl Aiyangār, patronised by Tīrumalai Nāyak, is perhaps the last illustrious figure in Vaiṣṇava literary history His works, called the Eight Minor poems (Aṣṭa prabandham), are favourites not only among the Vaiṣṇavas but also among all the other sects Many of his songs are charged with a positive fervour of devotion and service to Lord Viṣṇu and have a high emotional quality in them A writer by name Śāthakōpadāsa wrote a metrical biography of the Ālvārs, but the book is of poor literary quality.

A Tiruppuhal on the model of Arunagirī nātha, in praise of the 108 Viṣṇu shrines, was composed much later and this almost completes the survey of Vaiṣṇava literature down to the present day

Notes

- 1 It may be noted that the Sanskrit names for the Alvars are not mentioned in the first Guru paramparai (Six thousand) but are mentioned only in later works
- 2 In fairness to the acarvas it should be stated that they did not consciously attempt artificiality in writing, they conversed in this Sanskritic-Tamil language and merely wrote it down
- 3 His commentary on Periyalvar's Tirumoli was not available, even a few years after his day So, later Manavala ma munigal wrote a commentary on it,

VĒDĀNTA WRITING

The last part of the Vedas is the Vēda-anta, the Upanisads. These are the source for all philosophical thought on the Indian soil. Each spiritual teacher interpreted the Upanisads in his own way. Through that difference in interpretation came into existence the Advaita of Śankara, the Viśistādvaita of Rāmānuja and the Dvaita of Madhva. These three schools are wholly Sanskrit based. But the Tamil peoples before Śankara did have a knowledge of philosophy. They believed, in the ancient past, in one God. That God had no name. By the beginning of the Christian era, the nameless God was worshipped as Śiva by the Śaivās and as Viṣṇu by the Vaiṣnavas. When both their canons gave a great fillip to these concepts, they grew into separate religious sects by the 9th century A. D. Later Rāmānuja codified the theory and practice of the Vaiṣnava religion, no such codification was attempted at the period in Śaivism because the practice of Śaivism then was universal in Tamiḻnad. Innovation always requires definition, but the basic matrix, which never changes, required no definition.

SANKARA

In this context, about 240 years earlier than Rāmānuja, was born Śankara at Kālādī (which was then a Tamil speaking area, but later became part of the Malayalam speaking territory). He evolved a new philosophy namely, that there is only one Reality and that is Brahman and that there is nought else. He had then no work in Tamīlnad, because the practice of religion advocated by the Śaiva Nayanmārs and the Vaiṣṇava Ālvārs had a strong hold on the people at the time and his new tenets could scarcely have a following. He went north and founded his own centre at Kāncī. He wrote all his Bhāṣyas at Banaras and established his advaita doctrines there. He wrote everything in Sanskrit, though born in the Tamīlnad, not a single Tamīl word escaped him. This was natural because he had always to contend in the Sanskrit language with alien sects in North India.

His doctrines spread, later into Tamīlnad also. Although all the various religions are really vēdānta schools, the term vēdānta somehow attached itself to his school. Rāmānuja wrote all his works in Sanskrit, to refute Śankara. Madhva preached his philosophy outside the Tamīl area and so we are not concerned with it here. The Śaivas later wrote their books in Tamīl and called their doctrines the Suddha-advaita.

GITA IN TAMIL

In later years many books were written in Tamīl in the Śankara school. Śrī-Bhattachār wrote his metric translation of the Gīta in the 13th century, on the Śankara vēdānta lines, and called it Paramārtha darśana. It contains the same number of 18 chapters, verses being 550. It is written in good Tamīl. It has no currency among the brahmīns, but the non-brahmīn followers of Śankara study it well. Vādkēsari Alagiya Manavāla Jīyar wrote a venbā translation of the Gīta in the next century, following Rāmānuja, it had no popularity among the Vaisnavas Kannudaiya Vallal incorporated many vēdanta concepts into his writings and helped the growth of the vēdanta thoughts in the Tamil language. A modern venba translation had also been made for the Gīta.

TATTUVARAYA

But the greatest exponent of Śankara was Tattuvarāyar (15th century). His Pāduturai, Adangalmurai and other minor books, all expound the vēdānta thoughts, his two great anthologies, Perum tirattu and Kurum tirattu were also compiled towards this end. His literary output was very vast. He holds a unique place in Tamil theological writing for three reasons. One, he was the greatest exponent of the Śankara vēdānta in the Tamil language. Two, his complete works include five philosophical treatises, Mōhavatarp-parani, Ajñavatarp-parani, Īsvara gīta, Brahma gīta and Śaśvarna bōdham, all of them are of the vēdānta school. And thirdly, he has invented a hundred new poetic forms which never existed before him – such as the parrot, the kuyil, the cock, the lizard, the snake songs and many others. He was a giant among his contemporaries and in order to create a place for Śankara vēdānta in Tamil literature, he made these innovations boldly and successfully. Though an advaitin, his writings seem to be more of Śiva-advaita and less of absolute advaita.

Sri-Bhattanār and Tattuvarāyar were brahmins, but that community completely rejected their writings, if the writings have any following, it is only 'among the non-Sanskrit-knowing classes'. The same is the fate of Prabhōdha Candrōdayam, a large advaita work of the 17th century written by Tīruvēnkata nāthar¹, it is an epic type of work, studied only by the non-brahmin advaitins.

LATER WRITING

Two other vēdānta works deserve mention here. One is Kaivalya-navanītam and the other, Nānājīva-vātak-kattalai. The first is a metrical treatise by one Tāndavarāya swamī, composed in the 18th century. It has 310 verses (Kaivalya is the absolute state of the soul, free from all bonds, that state is release, navanītam is butter, the essence of the experience of that state). The title means that the treatise is the essence of the thoughts of many works on the subject. It is divided into two chapters – the explanation of the Reals, and the removal of doubts. The book gives a clear exposition of the vēdānta position in regard to the Paramatmā and the jīvātmā. All that is seen is unreal, the I is beyond the five sheaths of the body, God is the cause of the universe, the Intelligence-form of God and the Intelligence-form of the jīvātmā are the same, one who realises his own form as such is the jīvanmukta, his life is one of bliss – this is the substance of the book. Although recent from the point of view of time, the book is written in good Tamil and it gives a lucid and simple exposition of the Vēdānta. It has become a classic in a very short period. The other book is a short prose work giving out the principles of the Vēdānta. Both of these are deservedly popular among Tamil Vēdānta scholars.

Many works of Śāṅkara were translated into Tamil, prose and verse, to the end of the 19th century.

and the beginning of the 20th Śivaprakaśa swami, the Vīraśaiva poet of the 17th century, had done his Vēdānta Cūdāmanī in about 180 verses in translation. As usual these Tamil works are studied only by the non-brahmin advaitins

The Śankara math ever since its inception had existed only for the brahmīns. They had never encouraged the study of the Tamil vēdānta works; they swear only by Sanskrit. Other vēdānta scholars had founded centres for themselves and these have been fostering the growth of the Tamil vēdānta works and their commentaries

Reference

- 1 Vide page 104 under epic literature

VĪRA ŚAIVA WRITING

The contribution of the Vīra śaiva poets and theologians to the growth of Tamil Literature has been quite substantial. The Vīra śaiva cult was propagated by Basava in the Kannada country in the middle of the 12th century. It took several hundred years to filter into the heart of the Tamil country. From the 16th century we have books of varying quality written by persons professing this cult. Philosophical treatises, devotional poems, ethical books, purānas and commentaries on religious books have been written by them. Basava by his new revolutionary philosophy tried to evolve a new casteless society, although the Vīra śaiva cult gained popularity in the Kannada country, it is doubtful if this doctrine ever gained here the currency that he desired.

Rēvana siddha was probably the first writer. He wrote Aharādi Nighantu, a lexicographical work, and Sivajñānadīpam, a philosophical treatise. The latter is a very good Śaiva Siddhānta work, the author devotes only a few verses at the end of the treatise to explain the Vīra śaiva concepts. Prabhulinga Līlai and Siddhānta Śikhāmanī of Sivaprakāśa swamī, Advaita Venbā of Siddha Sivaprakāśa and the works of Śāntalinga swamī and of Kumāra dēva are the most important philosophical works of this sect and all of them belong to the 17th century.

Among devotional poems, those of Sivaprakāśa on his master Śiva jñāna pālaya Dēśika, on the Vengai temple and on some others, and the Tirup-pōrūr poems of Cidambara swāmī deserve special mention. The latter contain some very good pieces of poetry of a fine lyrical character, which will stand the test of time, endearing themselves to all people at all times. Nālvar nānmanī mālai of Sivaprakāśa, in praise of the four Śaiva acaryas, is very well known Sivaprakāśa's Nanneri is probably the only book on ethics written by a Vīra saiva, it is a short poem of good maxims in easy language, studied even today by school children. His purānas possess the literary flourish characteristic of him. Basava purāna by an unknown author is a very ambitious large work of a later period, on Basava and other top figures in the Vīra śaiva hagiology, but has poor poetic merit

Cidambara swamī again has written very good commentaries¹ on some of the theological works of his master and the others and they are eagerly studied by students of religion, his commentary on one book on non-killing, Kolaimaruttal, is very valuable

The study of logic was considered important to an understanding of philosophy, Sivaprakāśa has written a short manual on logic, of course adapted from the Sanskrit

In early Vīra śaivism, the Śaiva Siddhānta concepts were predominant. But as days passed, the glamour of Śāṅkara took a strong hold on the minds of the members and writers of that sect. By about the 19th century, that sect had drifted away from Śaiva

Siddhānta and identified itself, as it were, with Śāṅkara vēdānta. Śiva prakāśa swamī has written books on all the three schools His Śatamanī mālai, is an āgama translation, a Śaiva Siddhānta work, his Siddhānta Śikhāmanī is a Vīra Śaiva work, his Vēdānta Cūdāmanī is a Śāṅkara Vēdānta work

Note

- 1 This swamī is said to have written an elaborate gloss on Tiruvacakam, said to be in the hands of sectarian bigots, it has not seen the light of day. It is doubtful if the manuscript even if it really exists today, could survive till this day in a usable condition, since it is said to have been never handled.

JAINA LITERATURE

Unlike the Buddhists, the Jains had contributed quite a substantial volume to the growth of Tamil literature and its grammar. This was possible largely because they had the Pandiyan domains under their own rule for more than three centuries, from the third to the sixth. They had tried their hand at almost all the fields of Tamil literature, with varying degrees of success. We shall examine them here.

GRAMMAR

Their most successful field was the field of grammar. As the first Jains, namely the Kalabhra rulers of Madurai and their group, were foreigners, that is, as they did not have Tamil as their mother-tongue, they were able to look at the Tamil language with detachment and extract the truth and the rules about it from a linguistic point of view and write manuals on Tamil grammar with tremendous success. The highlights of their performance in this field are Tapparunkalam and its Kārikai on prosody, Nēminātham on letters and words, Vaccaṇandi mālai on poetics, Nambi ahapporuḷ on the love theme, and finally the most modern Nannūl (13th century) dealing with the letters and words, the lexicon Cūdāmaṇi Nighaṇṭu comes last. All these are substantial contributions to the concerned subjects and to that extent they had no doubt enriched the language and its literature.

Grammar requires an analytical brain which the Jain writers had in a large measure and hence their success in grammar writing

EPIC WRITING

Next we shall take up epic poetry. This has been already examined in a separate chapter. The Jain writers have indeed large volumes to their credit. The Perum kathai is perhaps the first epic written by a Jain. It is an original work, although the plot thereof is taken from the Hindu legends. The epic is in the āsuriyam metre, like Silappadhikāram and Manimēkhalai, and the chief aim of the author seems to be the glorification of life in the Tamil country, its art and culture and its richness. It is a marvel of composition. The other two books, Jīvaka cintamani and Cūlāmani are about princes whose life seems to have been taken from the Jain purānas. Each prince goes through a series of marriages, a few battles and other trials of life and finally ends up with renunciation. Cintāmani has some Jain doctrines mentioned in it, these are less in Cūlāmani. Both are important in the history of Tamil literature as some of the early attempts to harness the viruttam metre to the larger narrative poetry. They also have occasional flashes of poetry in a few verses. There had been quite a few long narrative poems in the same period, like Śāntipurānam, Nārada caritai etc., but these are all lost. Yaśōdhara kāvya and Udayanakumāra kāvya, a few centuries later, are much smaller poems, they are puerile works from all points of view and hardly deserve the name kāvya (epic). Mērumantara purāna, of the 15th century is a story about two princes, written with the purpose of propagating the Jain tenets. On the whole, surveying the Jain performance in the epic field we feel that it is a failure. There is nothing to recommend any book as a great work. Only Perum kathai is remarkable for the very luxuriant and elaborate descriptions the author revels in, but it is not a Jain story.

ETHICAL WRITING

We have here a dozen books dealing with the ethical subjects. Nāladī and Palamolī rank foremost, of these Nāladī is one of the best books on the subject while Palamolī is a very good imitation, closely following in its footsteps. Two other works are by Jains – Sirupancamūlam and Ēlādī, dealing with five and six subjects in each verse. All the four are among the 18 Kilkanakku Aranericcāram of a much later period, is a very good poetic piece, where the Jain author, in tune with the trend of his times, tries to give out some universal truths. These books are all in the venbā metre. Generally, the Jains are remarkably successful in dealing with ethical poetry.

COMMENTARIES

Many are the commentaries written by the Jains, both on literary works and on grammatical treatises. It is noteworthy that the first commentaries on literature and grammar (excepting the one by Nakkīrar on Irayanār kaḷaviyal) were probably written by them. We refer to Manakkudavar's commentary on Kural and Ilampūranar's exposition of Tolkāppiyam. Both are the first expositions on the two great works. It is to the great credit of Ilampūranar, that he has written on the three books of Tolkāppiyam, unlike the other writers (except Naccinārkkiniyar) who wrote only on the second book. It is to his everlasting glory that he discovered Tolkāppiyam and wrote on it, paving the way for future writers. Other commentary writers are insignificant except the anonymous one who wrote on Yāpparumkalam. Among the great figures in this field he towers as a giant. His gloss opens up a window on the lost treasures of grammar and prosody in the 8th to the 10th centuries, when there seems to have been a very intense and unceasing activity in this field. Along with the Kalaviyal commentator and the later Adiyārkkunallār, he is the only writer who makes us shed many a tear on the books lost for ever.

RELIGION

Of devotional poetry by the Jains, there is no work of any value. This is perhaps because God as such has no esteemed place in the Jain scheme of things; an ethical conduct alone has. Only Tiru Nūṛṇṇantādi of Avirōdhi ālvār¹ (14th century) seems to be written with an element of devotional ecstasy and lyric note, which is the characteristic of all Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava books. Beside this work, others like Tirukkalambakam pale into total insignificance.

Of purely religious books by the Jains, we have three and all of them are important. Nīlakēṣi was written to refute the doctrines of Buddhism as expounded by Kundalakēṣi, a large work, now lost. It is a good book as far as it explains Jain doctrines, and it has a good commentary. Arungalac-ceppu in the kural vēnba metre is a good manual of certain aspects of the Jain householder's life. The third book is Jīva sambōdhanai, a book of Jain doctrines in prose and verse.

The verse is good venbā, in imitation of Nalavenba, while the prose is also a classical manīpravāla style. The book deserves to be more widely known.

Speaking of manīpravāla, we should mention Śrī Purāna, which is a complete prose-purāna of the Jains in the manīpravāla style. It is the only large work of its kind in the language. Its purpose is an exposition of the Jain doctrines. Unlike the Vaisnava manīpravāla, this is extremely artificial, it appears as though the writer stopped now and then, hunted for Sanskrit equivalents, and replaced the Tamil word with the Sanskrit word or phrase. There is no flow in the language.

The Jains decry womanhood but it is very strange that Nīlakēṣi is a long poem whose only character is a woman, the heroine herself, so also is the fact that Nambi wrote his grammar on ahapporul or erotic love. In the same manner, it is hard to explain how an *ula*² came to be written in praise of a Jain shrine, where the usual theme is that young women, in their seven stages of life, see the deity in procession, and fall in love with it. In Jainism there is no personality of the Arhat to fall in love with.

Notes

1. This poet, as his name suggests, was a Vaisnava devotee (alvar) before he became a Jain convert, hence the element of devotional emotion in his antadī.
2. Appandar nathar ula, University of Madras, 1972. Here women in the seven stages do not fall in love with the hero, they are just attracted by his lustrous personality, which they praise,

BUDDHIST WRITING

Buddhistic influence must have been felt in the field of Tamil letters by the beginning of the Christian era. Maṃbōdhi is a rare Buddhist name among the poets of the sangham age. The Buddhists, unlike the Jains, had never assumed power anywhere in the Tamilnad and so their religion had not made any headway here. There are indeed very beautiful stray verses in praise of the Buddha cited in the commentaries on Yāpparunkalam and on Vīrasōliyam, but there are only one Buddhist work and one grammar by a Buddhist. Maṇimēkhalai,¹ said to be one of the five major epics, was written by Sīttalai Sāttanār for the purpose of expounding the Buddhist doctrines, it is considered a sequel to Silappadhikāram. Vīrasōliyam,² the only ancient grammar dealing with the traditional five branches of Tamil, was written by the Buddhist Buddhamiṭra of Ponparri. From citations in the old commentaries, we learn that there were many other Buddhist works such as the famed epic Kundalakēśi, Bimbisāarakathai, Siddhāntatohai, Mānāvūrp-padikam etc., but not one of them is available today. The stray verses referred to are in beautiful lyrical form and it is indeed a great loss to Tamil that the books containing such verses are no longer available. The doctrines of the four schools of Buddhism – the Soutrāntika, Yogācāra, Mādhyamika and Vaibhāṣika – come in for serious philosophical refutation³ at the hands of the Śaivas but no Tamil philosophical work of any of those schools is extant.

Even traces of Buddhism had ceased to exist in Tamilnad by the 8th century, we find in the legends connected with Saint Mānikkavācakar that the Buddhists had to go over to Cīdambaram all the way from Ceylon to engage in a religious disputation with him. there was no Buddhist worth the name in the whole of South India then We find from inscriptions however that a prince of Kadāram (part of modern Malaysia) caused a Buddha Vihāra to be built in Nagappattinam and that Kulōttunga I (1070 – 1120) gave many endowments to that temple

References

- 1 Vide chapter on epic literature page 99
- 2 Vide chapter on grammar page 27
- 3 Sivajana siddhiyar parapaksa, verses 64–142.

THE PURĀNAS

Purāna means an old story. The number of purānas in the Tamil language is legion. The great purānas in the Sanskrit language had been eighteen in number and several works in the Tamil language purport to be translations and condensations of those purānas. Macca (Matsya) purāna, Kūrma purāna, Linga purāna and Vāyu samhita are large complete metrical compositions from the Sanskrit books of the same name. There is also a very late metrical translation of Śiva mahapurāna at the turn of the last century. All these are Śaiva books and belong to the religious category. Viṣṇu purāna, Mārkaṇḍeya purāna and a host of others are in prose, the first is a Vaisnava purāna.

Purāna laksana, or the characteristics of a purāna, have been said to be five in Sanskrit. Of these three relate to the contents. They are the vamsa, manvantara and vamśānucarita - the particular dynasty, the evolution of time from the ancient past and the history of various other dynasties, and also cosmogony. All these subjects are fully dealt with in the major purānas, generally in the introductory part.

It is likely that many fairy tales and folk songs had been incorporated into the purānas in the remote past. To give an example. Sevvandi-purāna of Tīruccirāppaḷi mentions the story of Śiva enshrined there, having appeared as the mother of a lone young woman, when she was in the pangs of child birth and when her natural mother could not reach her in time because of the floods in the Kāvēri, the purāna says the Lord was thenceforth known as Tāyumānavar, He who became also the mother. This might very well have been a primitive fairy tale of the region

The Tamil purāṇas in general are of several categories. For purpose of discussion here, we may classify them into the following categories: the epic, the biography, the sthala purāna, and the religious purāna.

EPIC PURANA

Purāṇas of the epic type are called itihāsas. They are Kanda purāna of Kacciyappa Sīvācārya running to over ten thousand verses and the two Bhāgavatas, Itihāsa Bhāgavata of Sevvaic-cūduvār and Purāna Bhāgavata of Arulāladāsa, the first contains 4973 verses and the second 9147. Mēru mantara purana by Vāmana muni in 1405 verses is a Jain book, of the epic type.

Kanda Purāna is a very large work, purporting to sing of the exploits of Kumāra and his slaying of Sūrapadma. It has been conceived of by the Śaivas of a later day as a Śaiva counterpart to the story of Rama in Kamba Rāmāyana. The story runs parallel to the Rāmāyana in all its details, but the grand conceptions of Kambar, his portrayal of character, his probe into the depths of the human heart, depiction of dramatic scenes and high watermark of poetry are lacking here. Occasionally we may get glimpses of some good poetry but these do not make it great poetry Its chief importance lies in the fact that it deals elaborately with the story of Kumāra in a manner suitable for religious discourses and that it is full of Śaiva Siddhanta philosophical concepts

The two Bhāgavatas deal elaborately with the story of Viṣṇu as the Supreme Lord and of his ten avatāras (incarnations) They are typical purāṇas and do not lay any serious claim to higher poetry The Jain purāṇa mentioned is in the nature of a miniature epic on the lines of Cintāmani and Cūlāmani

STHALA PURANA

Purāṇas of the sthala purāṇa type are innumerable There is a purāṇa for every little shrine in the Tamilnad It is always in verse, running even to several thousand verses occasionally (Māyūra purāṇa-6519, Tirunelvēli over 9,000) The sthala purāṇas have at their commencement chapters glorifying the shrine, the deity installed there, the temple tank and the temple tree Sthala purāṇa is only glorified local legend, written up with a religious bias As has been said, it may be considered just a collection of local folk tales This characteristic always holds out an appeal to the common man They have been one of the influences which always hold out a ray of hope and redemption to the erring mortal Whatever sin a man might have committed, he will be redeemed if he sincerely repents in his heart, turns over a new leaf and prays to God Such is the teaching of all the sthala purāṇas Prayer to the deity in the local shrine absolves him of all sin. Homage to the deity implies homage to the place, the temple tank, the local river and the temple tree. Such books were first written in the 16th century and they continue to be written to the present day. Naturally the literary merit of such books cannot be great.

But yet there are a few of outstanding merit. One such is the Tiruvilayādal purāna of Paranjōṭi (about 1700 A D) It is written in forceful and fluent language, having a power and sweetness about it. Its style is charming and elegant and it contains good poetry also, but in the absence of the human element and character, it does not rise to the level of great poetry. Yet its devotional content is supremely lyrical and this will continue to influence the Śaiva mind for a long time to come. Other such sthala purānas of any importance are Kurralap-purāna of Tirikūtarājappa kavirāyar, Kancip-purāna of Sivajñāna swami and Tanikaip-purāna of Kacciappar. The greatest sthala purāna writer of all time was Minaksi sundaram Pillai of the mid-19th century.

BIOGRAPHICAL PURANA

Turning to the biographical type, we find two important works – Periya purānam of Sēkkilar (dealt with earlier) and Tiruvāḍavūr adigal purānam of Kadavul mā munivar. The latter is a small work of 545 verses. It is composed with a large proportion of rhythmic verses. But the only poetic sentiment that runs through the entire work is bhakti or religious devotion, no other element can be found in it and this of course detracts from its poetic quality. The life of Sēkkilār and the life of Nambiyāṇḍār nambī, though written by Umāpati Śivācārya, have in them only the predominant purpose of narrating the genesis of Periya purānam.

and the discovery of the Śaiva canon. Thus they fail to have any great poetic appeal. Pulavar purāna of Dandapāni swamī, and Sēyṭṭondar purāna of Cokkalīngam pillai are respectively the biographies of poets and the lives of the devotees of Muruga. They are modern attempts of the biographical type. There are many others also.

Harī samaya dīpam of Sathakōpadāsa and Guru-parampara prabhāvam (verse) of Vadivalagiyanambī dāsa are also biographical purānas in Vaiṣṇavism in the later centuries.

RELIGIOUS PURANA

Coming to the last category, we find very many purānas extolling religious practices. All of them are of a large size. They speak of the Śaiva emblems, rituals and worship, and dwell at length on the merit accruing from a worship of Śiva, the observance of penances, the celebration of festivals, and the service to Śiva and Śiva bhaktas. The two Upadēśa kāṇḍams written by two disciples of Kacciappa Śivācārya are the earliest and they belong to the 15th century.

We find from history that there was a heavy rush in purāna making in Tamil in the 16th century. One explanation perhaps is that several of the Pāṇḍīyas who had fled Madura on the Mohammedan invasion had by now settled and consolidated themselves comfortably in parts of Tirunelvēli and were able to extend their patronage to the poetic art. Some of the Pāṇḍīyas were themselves writers and had contributed thousands of verses to purāṇic literature. All of their purānas are large religious ones. In fact, most of the religious practices and observances in the Śaiva society today are on the lines laid down in their books. Śiva dharmōttara, considered to be an upāgama, also belongs to this category. They always give elaborate accounts of the bhaktas who sinned, then repented and were redeemed by the grace of God.

We do not find any such purāna written in Vaiṣṇavism.

Reference

- 1 For an exhaustive treatment of the subject of puranas, vide my History of Tamil Literature, 16th century - Part I, Purana Literature (Tamil) to be released shortly

MINOR POEMS — I

Minor poems as such begin to be written in great profusion from the 16th century onwards. Prabandha maraṇṇiyal, a short grammatical manual of that period on poetics, mentions for the first time that the prabhandhas are of 96 categories. Although we had books on poetics from the 8th century, this number had not been specified previously. A prabhandam is a minor poem sung on a divine being or a patron, its subject may be aham or puram, it may be in any type of metre, from āsuriyam to viruttam, or the long drawn out kalivenbā, the number of verses in a poem may also be anything, yet some titles have specified the number of verses as 5, 8, 20, 30, 40, 70 and even upto 400. (Prabandha means well composed)

Prabandhams have been sung even in the days of the sangham and of the period of the Śaiva and the Vaiṣṇava hymns. Tolkāṇṇiyam, Purattinaṇṇiyal mentions a few types of such minor poems of the puram themes, some are also found as occasional verses in the Pura nānūru. Ārruṇṇipadaṇṇai had been many in the sangham period. Poems named according to the number of the verses in them such as the forty, the fifty and the seventy etc are found among the 18 Kīl-k-kanakku. Other poems such as the Irattaiṇṇaṇṇi mālai, Antādi, Madal, Elukūrrirukkarai, Maram, Angamālai, Paḷḷi-yelucci, Ulā, Mummanikkōvai etc. had been in existence during the seventh and the ninth centuries in the Śaiva and the Vaiṣṇava canon. The number and variety of the composition grew with the centuries. We shall notice below the salient features of the more important minor poems.

ARRUPPADAI

Among the puram poems, the Ārruppadaṭ had been the earliest. We find many examples of it in Puraṇānūru, of course these are all short occasional verses. In Pattupṭṭu we have five poems of this class, all lengthy ones in the āsiriyam metre. The ārruppadaṭ is a poem where a dancer, a musician, or a poet or devotee is guided to go to a patron of arts, or to the presence of God in a temple, display his art or poetry, supplicate himself to the patron with devotion, and receive munificence at his hands. The guide himself had once been a poor and indigent person, but had become affluent by going to that patron, singing before him, and getting lavish gifts from him. In the course of a long poem, there are many pen-portraits and interesting descriptions of the patron himself, his place, the manner of his feeding the poor, the sweet welcome that he offers, and the rich presents he gives and the peace and joy that descend on the recipient. The most famous arruppadaṭ is the one on Muruga, Tiru Murugārruppadaṭ which has been collected into two anthologies - as the first poem in Pattupṭṭu of the Sangham age, and as a devotional poem in the 11th Book of the Śaiva canon during the early 11th century.

In Tiru Murugārruppadaṭ, the human patron gives place to The Patron of all, God, where the poet introduces the aspirant to the path and the presence of God. Later arruppadaṭ has been few, but from the 16th century onwards, a new type, the viral-arruppadaṭ had been developed.

BHARANI

The Bharani is perhaps the most important separate poem on the theme of war. It generally sings of the glory of the victory of the ruling chief. The first and deservedly most famous is the Kalingattupparani, sung by Jayamkondār in honour of the victory of King Kulōttunga I over the North Kalinga forces by about 1112 A.D. It celebrates a real war, a real hero and a real commander of his army. The poem consists of about 600 couplets mostly in a rhythmic liting metre, the sound and pace of the metre varying with the events of the narrative.

The story content of the Bharani is as follows. The news of the Chōḷa victory reaches the city. Young women go round waking up the other women to welcome the victors and celebrate the victory. The next scene shifts to the actual battle field. Kālī, the patron deity of war, is enshrined in a temple in an arid desert. She is surrounded by a large army of ghosts, living in that fearful wilderness. Her attendants and the entire army of ghosts are lean and famished, through long starvation. The ghosts usually feed on human flesh strewn about in the battle fields, but since there had been no war for long, they are now famished. A visiting ghost plays many feats of magic before Kālī, conjuring up a battle scene. This makes the hunger of the ghosts more acute and they pray to the goddess to call a halt to the display. Just then another ghost breaks in with the news of a real battle which the Chōla king had just then fought and won. With gaping mouths and watering lips, the ghosts make a stampede to the battle field, gather and cook the flesh and meat and brains of the fallen in the battle, have a hearty meal, and thank the king and the goddess for thus giving them sumptuous food.

For the amorous and erotic nature of the first waking-up scene, the description of the desert, of the temple and of the goddess Herself, of the famished appearance of the ghosts, of the relaxation of the king on the banks of the Pālāru, the march of the armies, the actual battle and of the ghastly yet humour-laden feast of the ghosts there, the book has no parallel in the vast range of Tamil literature. The erotic verses here are on a high poetic level and they never stoop low. This poem is one on an actual battle while in later such poems we have no real fight at all. Dakkayāgap-parani and Hiranyavataṭṭa-parani describe purāṇic battles, while others like Ajñavataṭṭa-parani and Pāṣavataṭṭa-parani deal only with allegorical battles. Hence no other poem of the kind comes anywhere near this in realistic poetic quality. Besides, Kalīngattup-parani is also valuable for the light it throws on the genealogy of the Chōlas upto Kulōttunga I.

The author has sung here a large variety of chandams which had become a model for all later writers. Figures like the onomatopoeia and the pun are freely employed with startling effect. The whole poem has a dramatic setting and there are scores of verses which are each the enacting of a separate dramatic scene. One writer has remarked that the

'the praise lavished on the poem needs to be qualified' and that it has no message¹ The estimate is not correct The whole poem has to be seen with a sense of humour and has to be viewed also from the background of contemporary history There are scores of verses here which are supremely emotional lyrics The battle field may not be the place for emotional poetry but within the limited sphere the poet has achieved marvellous success The book does leave a message It had infused the greatest patriotism in the people of the Chōla country and had helped to fortify the Chōla empire for two centuries after it was written No wonder the author Jayamkondār was hailed for this short poem, even in his own life time, a kavirakravarthi, an emperor among poets, and the phrase, 'a Jayamkondār for a bharani' was coined

PILLAI TAMIL

Another important minor poem is the pillai-Tamil song on childhood This poem is now generally in ten sections with ten verses to each section Every decad here carries a refrain from which the decad takes its title as muttam, tālu, senkīrai etc But Periyālvār originally sang a number of such poems on Kṛiṣṇa, the child of Yasōda. The poems are polished gems of dazzling beauty and form, rightly part of the Vaisnava canon Some five centuries after him, Ottakkūttar selected a few topics from Ālvār and Āṇḍāl and evolved his first pillai-Tamil, composed in praise of Kulōttunga Chōla II, when he was a crown prince. In later days, such poems have been composed on all the deities, except Lord Śiva², and on many chieftains. These poems are all in chandam, a rhythmic metre, mostly long, and are very popular even to this day.

Some of them are sung in musical concerts also. Poems such as Tiruccendūr Murugaṇ pillai - Tamil, Mīnāksi ammaṇ pillai - Tamil and Muttukkumāraswāmī pillai - Tamil are of high poetic quality and emotional religious fervour, and even today they melt listeners to tears. Sekkilar pillai - Tamil, written by Mīnāksi-sundaram Pillai by the middle of the 19th century, is a classic by itself. Little would the Ālvār have dreamt that his innovation would develop to such proportions in later years. Since all these poems are only in praise of deities and the like, they also belong to the class of puram pieces.

There are many pillai - Tamil poems of the 20th century, of which special mention may be made of Gandhī pillai - Tamil by Raya Cokkalingam and Kāvaṇ Murugaṇ pillai - Tamil by Appulingam.

The last three sections of the poem vary when it is sung on a female deity, to suit the play habits of a female child; it is usually this part that is extended to more than three sections by some poets.

KALAMBAKAM

The kalambakam (a mixture) is a poem of usually one hundred verses, employing all the metres known, depicting both the puram and the aham themes. The verses are strung together in the antādi form where the end word or syllable of a verse occurs as the opening word or syllable of the next. The kalambakam is naturally very popular, and often very well done also, because of the wide scope both in the themes and in the metre. All the moods and sentiments of poetry find expression here. Eighteen parts are required to be incorporated into the poem. The poem is as usual sung in praise of a deity or a patron. The one by an unknown author on Nandivarma III, the Pallava ruler of Kāncī, 9th century, is deservedly the most famous. It is also the best poetic piece. The legend goes that he gave up his life for the mere joy of listening to a recitation of the poem, many a discriminating heart among the Tamil poetry lovers will easily applaud his action.

Although manuals prescribe the topics for inclusion in the poem, the poet's imagination has conjured up many other topics also.

Next we shall speak a few words about some of the more important minor poems on the aham themes. Four types of such poems here call for our attention - the kovai, the ulā, the madal and the dhūtu.

KOVAI

The kōvai is in a sense a connected narrative of the stray aham topics of the sangham poetry. Each character in the love theme speaks - rarely does the poet himself speak. The sangham verses were in the āsiriyam metre, whereas the kōvai is written in the much more laborious kattalai-kalitturai, in which the syllables in every foot are counted as 16 or 17 and follow a particular sequence of arrangement. The first kōvai poem is *Pāndik-kōvai*³ in praise of the Pāndiya Nedu māra who was the contemporary of Saint Sambandha, the entire book is not available today, from the fragments available, we are led to believe that it was a very large work, where more than one verse was composed on each topic. The next kōvai in point of time is Tiruk-kōvaiyār, attributed to Saint Mānikkavācakar. Perāsiriyar wrote a neat gloss on this. This contains just 400 topics, the pattern of this kōvai and this number have been adopted by most later writers, some had adopted topics exceeding even 500. Usually the kōvai has a hero of the story-events narrated, and another called a patron in whose honour the poem is sung. The only exception to this arrangement was the later Ambikāpati - kōvai (12th century) where there is no patron. Kōvai poems have been composed even up to the present century, but their popularity has fast disappeared, because of the inelastic monotony of the subject and of the verse.

We give below in a few words the substance of the kōvai in a connected narrative. A youth meets a handsome maiden in a cool bower and the two fall in love and immediately become man and wife. They part. Some days later his friend helps him to meet her, and then her friend helps him. The maiden who was till now watching over the family's tinai field, is now asked to return home. The lover meets her during the day and then during the night, under great hazards. Meanwhile, the moods of the girl make her people have recourse to a soothsayer called vēlan, in the mistaken belief that she is 'possessed'. Now she expresses her desire that he should straightway come forward to marry her openly. He leaves her for sometime on various pretexts. He returns and sends her people presents to signify his willingness to marry her. But when they are not prepared to give her hand to him, the foster mother who is in the girl's secret, helps her to elope with her lover. He marries her in his own place. They live together happily for sometime, when he goes away to a harlot. He returns on hearing of the birth of a boy to his wife. Then again he leaves her on a study mission, then on the king's mission, and so on. Lastly he makes some money, comes home and the two live happily ever after.

The kōvai poem seems to have had two purposes. one, the poets of later day loved to imitate the aham poetry of the sangham age, and two, they wished to pay their homage to Tiruk-kōvayār attributed to Māṇikkavācakar.

ULA

The next poem is the Ulā. The first such poem was sung by Sēramān Perumāḷ, whose songs have been included in the 11th book of the Śaiva canon 'Seven ages of Man' said Shakespeare in the 16th century, but Sēramān said 'seven ages of Woman' in the opening years of the 8th century. The ages range from 5 to 40. Lord Śiva comes out in a procession in the streets of Tillaḷ (Cīdambaram) one evening, and all the women, namely those belonging to the seven age groups, see him and fall in love with him. The poet portrays the girls, their moods and lament, and their action in a manner quite appropriate to their age. The Lord Śiva is the hero here, His various attributes, His bath and dressing, His retinue and their action, are all very vividly described. Pēdar, is a small child, age group 5 – 8, she cannot of course know what love can be. The next is a lass Pedumbar, 8 – 13, she is of the adolescent group, a problem age, she knows and knows not her mind, this difficulty has been well experienced by writers, and has given rise to the saying, 'to the ulā writer, the age of the pedumbar is like a tiger, the most difficult'. The other age groups are young and grown up women, who know definitely what love is. The last is the pēriḷampēṇ aged 40, a matronly woman, whose love of the Lord tends to be other worldly. The poem is in the long continuous kalivenbā metre, Sēramān's poem has about 200 kanni or couplets, we have others running to over 700. These poems have been written not only on deities such as Muruga, Viṣṇu, Ganapati etc., but also on patrons, men of God, and similar human personalities. A large volume of such poems has been written and they display a great revelry in the luxuries of life and in the flights of imagination. Though composition in a long and simple continuous narrative may tend to become monotonous and hamper the poetic expression, it is not so in fact. The difference in the age group of the girls from five years to forty gives a free hand to the poet in giving a psychological treatment to the subject and often we are able to enjoy the thought and emotional content of the poem, besides the sound effect. But they have gone out of date by the beginning of this century.

MADAL

The first Madal poems were written in the 8th century by Ālvār Tirumangai and they form part of the Vaiṣṇava canon. They are known as the shorter and the longer Tirumadal and contain 77 and 148 couplets, strung together into a single long poem. The poem is extremely artificial in this that each has the same initial rhyming arrangement in all its 145 or 297 lines as the case may be. Here a girl pining for the love of Viṣṇu declared that if her love was not returned by Him, she would make a horse of palmyrah stalks and ride it, meaning thereby that she would immolate herself. The poems are important because of their antiquity. The madal is a familiar love theme in sangham poetry, where generally it is the male that offers to mount the palmyrah horse and die because of unrequited love, madal for the woman has been explicitly prohibited, because it is unwomanly and immodest of her to speak openly of her love. The madal poems of Kālamēgham and Tattuvarāyar are well known. But yet, either form of the madal is an unusual poem in later literature.

DHUTU

On the other hand, the Dhūtu came into existence as an independent long poem in the 14th century and immediately became popular. There are now scores of such poems. The dhūtu is a love poem, intended to convey the message of love from the girl to the lover. It is there in sangham poetry in the form of short verses where the separated lady, in a frenzy of love, sends birds and bees to go to her lover, speak of her longing, and bring him back. The woman-singer is most often addressed in this manner for bringing back the hero from the battle field to his lady love. The Mēghasandēśa of Kalidāsa is the most famous of such dhūtu poems in Sanskrit. The first such poem in Tamil was written by Saint Umāpati Śivācārya, a Śaiva spiritual preceptor addressing his own heart to go to his master and secure his garland in token of his grace towards the pupil. Later poetic convention lays down the objects which can be employed to carry the love message as ten, such as the heart, the south wind, the swan, the parrot, the cloud etc., but a host of others have also been employed by poets. Umāpati's poem is called the Nenju-vidu-dhūtu, a Tamil-vidu-dhūtu (17th century) is deservedly very famous. The dhūtu poem like the ulā is a single long poem in the kalivenbā metre, often running to 700 couplets and more. We see in these poems the most brilliant flashes of poetic conceit. They had a wide popularity till the end of the last century.

The Vīrali-vīdu-dhūtu of recent times is a very long poem where considerable vulgarity is introduced to please the petty chief to whom the vīrali (woman singer) is sent. Here poetry is subordinated to the theme of erotic love. There were incessant wars among the chieftains or polygars in those days. This poem, by introducing the vīrali, a woman singer-cum-dancer to the patron, who was in those days a petty chief of the degenerate times, seeks to pander to his amorous nature. These patrons were mostly uneducated, uncultured rustic men, to whom only the vulgar, the sensuous and the bizarre had the greatest appeal. Their morals were not high and hence even a little gifted poet, unless he was spiritually inclined, could not help pandering to the tastes of such men. The vīrali arruppadaṭi and dhūtu, the kādal and the nondinātakam are such long poems of an erotic and sensuous nature.

Notes and References

- 1 Jesudasan. A History of Tamil Literature 1960, page 188
- 2 There is no pillai-Tamīl on Śiva. Śiva is the Supreme Being and it had been the literary convention to this day not to bring down that Being to the level of a child and sing a pillai-Tamīl poem on Him. It has however been sung on Viṣṇu, Śakti, Vinayaka and Muruga, although these are considered the manifest forms of the Supreme. The sections of the pillai-Tamīl have occasionally been increased to even twelve, the number of verses in a section

MINOR POEMS – II

We have examined thus far some of the larger types among the minor poems in Tamil literature ; this does not mean that they were the only important ones of the early period . There are yet many more types, which though smaller in size, are even greater in importance to the scholar and to the people . One feature has to be noted . Tamil poetry, which sang mostly of man in the sangham age, gradually came to be dedicated to God and generally we find from the seventh century up to the end of the sixteenth, all poetry had been mostly on God , it seems to have been considered a sin to glorify man . Poems like Pāndik-kōvai, Nandik-kalambakam, and Bharani, Ulās and Pillar-Tamil on the Chōlas, are rare exceptions

Two of the most cherished poems are the pāvai and palli-elucci . These poems have been sung in the Vaisnava as well as the Śaiva canon . They are considered to have great spiritual import . Among the Vaisnavas, they form part of the daily prayer book

PAVAI

Tiruppāvai by Āndāl wields such an influence over the Vaisnavas, as no other work, not even Nammālvār's poems, has . Nammālvār's poems are philosophical and spiritual, while Āndāl's poem is on the personal and the physical plane . The pāvai theme has the most artistic treatment with Āndāl . Perhaps it is reminiscent of a religious observance of the worship of Kṛiṣṇa by the āyar, the cowherds' clan. Girls here gather together, very early in the morning, wake up the others in order to go to the river for a bath and the worship of Kṛiṣṇa. They really bathe in the grace of Viṣṇu and pray for the right husbands for themselves, and for prosperity and rains for the land. The girls are all young children, they go to the house of Nandagōpa the foster-father of Kṛiṣṇa, wake him up, and pray to him to accept their services for ever and ever. The poem of 30 verses is unexcelled for its luscious description of the morning, of nature in the cowherds' quarters and of other girls still asleep. It has endeared itself to all the Vaiṣṇavas, women equally as men, because of the language and description and the enjoyment of the richness of life and its many pleasures which it vividly portrays. The esoteric meaning of the poem is beyond the scope of our consideration here.

Māṅkavācakar's poem of 20 verses, called the Tiru embāvai, is more austere in tone and cast differently. From the beginning there is a spiritual note, one of actual surrender to God. Śiva has no child-form and so the play conception of Āṇḍāl does not enter here. There is an actual bath here and a praise of the grace of Śiva and His five-fold functions directed towards the redemption of the souls. Several pavar poems of indifferent merit have been attempted by later writers.

PALLI ELUCCI

The palli-elucci in both the canons is a short poem of ten verses, its theme is to wake up the Lord in order that he may bestow His grace on the mortals. The concept of Paḷli-elucci is beautifully expressed by Mānikkavācaka in one of his songs. True to his spirit of absolute surrender to God, he goes up to the Lord in his song and wakes Him up, 'My Lord of Tirup-Perumturai' What is Thy command for me today? I have come to Thee to know it, please wake up' This is the general tone of all palli-elucci songs. The pallāndu again is a poem of 12 verses, a benediction on the Lord and a prayer for His continued grace on His devotees. This poem in each canon was sung under dramatic situations which warrant the conferring of a benediction on God by a mortal.

A padikam is a short poem of ten verses, generally having a common ending, sung in praise of a deity. Almost all the Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava canons consist of padikams. This is a very simple form of poetry which continues from the fifth century to this day, it has no theme except the praise of God.

ANGA MALAI

There are a few other types which are interesting on account of the themes contained in them. The Anga mālai of Saint Appar is one which ever has an appeal to the devotee and to the young child, it consists of twelve couplets, each is addressed to an organ of the body like the head, eye, ear, nose, heart etc., and each is called upon to bow to Him, see Him, hear His praises, think of Him, walk round His temple and so on. It is couched in a simple but interesting metre where the opening phrase occurs as a refrain of the verse and the whole poem has been a source of joy to children and very aged people alike, because of the song quality and the thought content. Tirumangaḷ wrote a poem on the same verse pattern.

on a love theme¹ where the love-sick maiden calls upon the pheasant, the parrot, the kuyil and the others and asks each to bring her Lord to her Both the poems lend themselves easily to light singing

OTHER POEMS

Dasāṅgam was probably invented by Māṇikka-vācakar in the venbā metre, it is a poem of ten verses celebrating the traditional ten insignia of royalty He was a minister under a Pāṇḍiya ruler and the appurtenances of sovereignty would easily have suggested themselves to him Here he applies them to God He has adapted many folksong motifs into his verses and they had gained immense popularity, the ammāṇai, sunnam, ūsal and undi may be specified as illustrations.

The citrakavi is of several types familiar in later day poetry, where there is a great play of words, sounds, letters and numbers, of course the sense and poetry are generally sacrificed Jñāna Sambandha young in age revels in citrakavi, he has sung many such poems. One is the Elukūrrirukkal in ahaval, where the numbers are built up from one to seven, each time beginning from one, going to the top, coming back to one, and again going up The praise of God runs all through His invention has been followed by half a dozen others

Mālai mārru mālai is another by Sambandha, it is a rare citrakavi, where the verse remains the same even when read from its last letter, in the reverse direction, all the difficulty arises only in giving out the meaning of the verse.

Many minor prabandhas like the Irattai - mani - mālai had been written even by the fifth century. Variations in metre, in thought and in the number of verses had given rise to scores of poems such as the Orupā orupatu, Irupā-irupatu, Mummanik-kōvai, Nānmanī mālai etc. The love poem kōvai had variations such as the Varukkak - kōvai and the Oruturaik - kōvai. Many prabandhas in dramatic form were written after the 16th century, like the Kuravanji, Pallu and Nondi - nātakam, these were seen in the section on drama. All forms of the minor poems had been sung originally as short or long poems, only in praise of the glory of God. In later years, they were sung on the spiritual guru, still later, when political life was very uncertain, on petty local chiefs also.

We do not have any minor poem describing an object or place or event, or having any separate story content or experience. People considered no experience other than spiritual experience worth writing down. The Kalavali-nārpātu, one of the Kīlk-kanakku was written to celebrate an actual event, namely the battle between Kōccengat-chōla and the Sēra, Irum-dorai, it was written long before the Canons.

Narī viruttam of Tīru-Takkadēvar is a solitary exception of a story being narrated to teach a moral. Panca tantiram of Vīramārttānda dēva, an adaptation from Sanskrit, is a book of short stories in verse, preaching morals to young children.

Reference

1. Periya Tirumoli, 10 10.

ANTHOLOGIES

Any developed language makes a compilation of selections from its authors according to the needs of the times. Students of English literature may be familiar with Palgrave's Golden Treasury of select verses of English poetry made for the beauty and poetic value of the verses. Such a scheme of compilation has been going on in Tamil Literature from the earliest period of its history. We shall only briefly indicate the trends here. The entire Sangham poetry is a set of compilations. Pattup-pāttu is one of ten songs, there were certainly many more, but the compiler probably collected together only ten. Similarly Ettuttohāi consists of eight anthologies, Aha nānūru, Narrinai and Kuruntōhai are anthologies of occasional verses on aham, Puranānūru on puram, Paripādal of musical pieces, Patirrup-pāttu is a collection of ten poems on puram of ten authors, each poem having ten verses in praise of one Sēra prince, Kalittōhai, a compilation of groups of verses by five authors on the five tinais, and Ainkurunūru of 100 verses each by five authors. The legend is that Nāladi itself is an anthology of 400 isolated verses.

Next in point of time are the Śaiva and the Vaisnava canon. In the latter the first and the third thousand are by several authors, while the second and the fourth are by one ālvār each, Tirumangai and Nammālvār. Similarly in the Śaiva canon, the Ninth and the Eleventh Books are collections of poems by many authors.

We understand there was a grammatical treatise on puram by twelve authors in the 8th century, by name Panniru patalam, it is a grammatical anthology, so also is Panniru pāttiyal, a collection of verses from 15 writers on prosody and poetics, 10th century

Purattirattu, of 1570 verses, dealing with aram, porul and inbam on the model of Kural, is an anthology of verses selected from the earliest writing, chiefly with an eye towards poetic value. At about the same time, two selections were made from the Śaiva Dēvāram, one by Umāpati, with 100 verses and another by one Agastīya with 25 poems (about 250 verses). Two other small collections had been in use from the olden days, one from Periya purānam having about 50 verses, and another from the entire Śaiva canon, to be used on the occasions of Śiva pūja. Paṭṭinattār pādal and Tāyumānavar pādal are anthologies of verses which were available to the compilers of the respective authors.

The latter half of the 19th century and the first half of the 20th witnessed the collection of many anthologies. Tamil seyyul kalambakam and Pannūl tiraṭṭu, collections from standard works, made for their didactic value, Śaiva manjari, a collection from standard Śaiva works made for their philosophical value; Tanp-pādal tirattu, a comprehensive collection of stray verses made with a view to preserving them, Tanucceyyul cintāmaṇi, on the same lines but more elaborate, a selection of 1000 verses from Rāmalinga swamī for use in prayers, and lastly Perum tohai of M Raghava Aiyangar, a very ambitious and well edited scholarly work (aram and porul only), of all stray verses having any literary value, and also of unidentified quotations from the commentators, he passed away before he could issue the second volume comprising of the part inbam. A slender volume of a collection of verses from the inscriptions has also been made.

Vēdānta manana cintāmaṇi is a collection of about 10,000 verses from all philosophical and religious books, numbering 227, made by Karapātra-Sivaprakāśa swamī, to be of use to students of the vēdānta philosophy, it was compiled in the first decade of this century.

There have been many advaitic selections from philosophical works from the 15th century to this day. Tattuvarāyar made two such selections, Perum-tirattu and Kurum-tirattu, containing 2821 and 1340 verses respectively. He seems also to have made a much smaller compilation named Sivānubhōgat-tirattu containing 305 verses, taken from 73 books. Sankara nārāyanat-tirattu is a similar compilation, of a later period.

Two short anthologies deserve mention here ; they have a peculiar characteristic, the poems contained in them had all come into existence in the 18–19 centuries. One is the vannam consisting of a single verse, having the equivalent of about 200 lines, distributed into four quarters, each quarter having a pendant – an arresting phrase of two or three words. The verse is mostly erotic, in praise of a shrine or a patron, it is always written in an artificial and elaborate rhythmic pattern, with a symmetric arrangement of the soft, medium or hard sounds as may be planned, having a regular beat and lilt ; it was then the fashion to write such verses and average poets prided themselves on their capacity to write such verses, they called themselves vannak-kalanjyam, repository of vannam. There are one or two anthologies of such verses which still provide entertainment to the pedants. Some modern grammarians had also written out a grammar for the vannam. The second half of the vannam was usually the lament of the mother at finding that her daughter had eloped with her lover, the first half should contain praise of a deity, praise of the gifts (of the deity or the patron), praise of the glory and victory, and praise of the city and the country of the patron.

Another type is the epistolatory verse (sittukkavi) where the poet sends an epistle to his patron in verse form. The epistle in verse started with the second verse of Kurumtohar and the first verse of the 11th Book of the Saiva canon, both attributed to Iraiyanār (Lord Siva). But in the modern period the verse is always a long viruttam. The first half of the verse contains the conceited boasts of the writer about himself, and the second half contains a bombastic eulogy of the patron and ends with a request that the patron supply the writer the particular object or money that he may require. There is a collection of over thirty verses and it had a popularity with learners and scholars during the first quarter of this century.

This gives a picture of the general trend of poetic anthologies during the last 20 centuries. We have here the sangham poetry, religious poetry, grammatical collections, devotional verses, philosophical collections, and comprehensive collections of all occasional verses. Only Purattirattu may be said to be a poetic anthology compiled for poetic values.

During the second quarter of this century, there lived T. K. C. (T. K. Chidambaranatha Mudaliyar), the poetic connoisseur and literary savant, who made it his mission in life to pick out brilliant poetic pieces, not only from well known literary works but also from obscure and unfamiliar works, and make them come alive, vibrating with vigour and vitality, scintillating with colour and lustre, and dancing with grace and form before the listener, illiterate or learned. He was the one person who had an unfailing eye for poetry and who could keep kindred spirits enthralled by his exposition. But unfortunately he died without publishing any collection and Tamilnad is all the poorer.

THE SIDDHAS

There is quite a decent volume of Siddha literature in the Tamil language and it will therefore be worthwhile to know the Siddha poets and their writing. The word siddha means a realised soul. Though Tīrumūlar is known as a siddha, his songs have been collected into the Śaiva canon and so we are not discussing him here. The poems of the other siddhas are said to have been collected into a handy volume known as the 18 Siddhar jñāna kōvai,¹ but the volume is not real siddha poetry. There are in it large sections of modern writing in prose and verse which will hardly fit in with the siddha writing. We shall therefore be content here with examining the writings of a few well-known siddhas.

SIVA VAKKIYAR

The first name to occur to the mind of any one is Śiva vākkīyar. He was a deeply religious siddha who valued most the Śiva enshrined in the heart. He was generally considered to be an iconoclast because he vehemently decried temple worship, he did so no doubt, but he said still more vehemently that man should make his heart the temple of God. He had scant respect for rituals which in popular belief had become a substitute for love and service to God and to fellow beings. He was a vehement opponent of caste Almost all the siddhas believed in the oneness of all creation and they preached a philosophy of love and service and of an inward contemplation, Śiva-vāḱkiyar is a shining example of this faith. Some of his verses have the force of a sabre thrust.

PATTINATTAR AND AVVAI

Pattinattār the siddha lived probably about the same time as Śiva vāḱkiyar and he too condemned material pleasures as the greatest obstacle to spiritual advancement. Śiva vāḱkiyar had no word to say against woman, but this Pattinattār always carried on a tirade against them. His one message was compassion, sharing one's food with the hungry.

It is Pattinattār who brought the highest spiritual wisdom and its emotional flight in both polished and rugged poetry to the level of the so-called masses. Till recently, there was no mendicant beggar or wandering minstrel who did not sing a dozen of his verses to the accompaniment of an one-stringed self-made harp. The content of the song, the attunement of the minstrel, and his rugged harp blended, strangely enough, harmoniously with the rural setting.

Pattiragiri, according to legend, renounced a princely life on seeing the value of Pattinattār's renunciation and became his disciple. He has written the Pulambal or Lamentations, containing 235 couplets², expressing his passionate longing for the realisation of God and for deliverance from sins. He always expresses here love for fellow beings and reverence for all womanhood. Avvai in Tamil literature has been many, and we would consider the Avvai, who sang Jñānak-kural and Vinayakar ahaval, a siddha. Her two poems are very popular and although she is not spoken of as a siddha, she is indeed one, both by her life and by her songs.

^c OTHERS

There have been a few more minor siddhas who have sung a few moving poems each, though couched in obscure and mystic language. The name of Pāmbātti siddha, the snake charmer, is the foremost among them. His song, Ādu pāmbē, is famous in the whole of Tamilnad today.³ He is a mystic and all his thoughts are couched in mystic language. The kundalinī śakti is the serpent which he would like to charm and cause to play. Alugunī siddha is another,⁴ who had only a few verses to his credit. The tone of his songs is one of lament and hence his name Alugunī, the mourner. He addresses his songs to Kannammā, and perhaps this inspired Bhārati, the modern national poet of Tamilnad, to compose his famous Kannammā songs. Ahappēy is another,⁵ the mind is the devil (pēy) and he addresses his songs to that mind. The mind roams about without any fixed purpose, skipping from one thing to another. His songs are intended to fix it in the Śaiva spiritual path. Kaduvelī is yet another,⁶ he is the author of the type of verse since known as the ānandak-kalippu. He condemns all malpractices in the siddha order and laments that people do not put to proper use this mortal frame which is hard to obtain. Kutambai siddha is another very popular siddha poet,⁷ who addresses his profoundly mystic songs to a child, wearing the ear ornament, kutambai. The last important siddha is Iḍaikkāttu siddha, who hails from 'a jungle of cowherds' and hence this name. He has couched his songs in the form of a dialogue between two cowherds tending their cows and sheep. In the process of tending, milking etc., all his ideas are expressed in their words. There are a few minor siddhas of lesser importance, like the Ēnāḍi siddha ⁸

SIDDHA WRITING

All the siddhas are a group of mystics who revolt against caste and rituals and the established order of religion. They are no doubt bhaktas but their bhakti is of a different type. They are very critical of the practice of religion but always hold fast to the one Supreme God and pray for His Grace. Their revolt is only in the manner of their criticism and the challenge they throw to orthodoxy. They are generally against idol worship and they emphasize the worship of God in the heart. All the siddhas have been Śaivas.

The siddha seems to have been a general term applied to some who wrote medical treatises also. They had attained a certain level of achievement in medicine or siddhi, and so are known as siddhas. Their system of indigenous medicine, when practised correctly, has been found to be quite successful.

References

1. 18 Siddhar Jñanak-kovai, Ratna nayakar publication, 1937. 2. Ibid page 188 3 Page 204. 4 Page 326. 5 Page 242 6 Page 259. 7. Page 255 8 Manuscript, vide my History of Tamil Literature 15th century (Tamil) pages 331-3.

BALLADS AND FOLK-SONGS

BALLADS

There are many ballads in Tamil Literature and most of them are relatively very ancient. Whereas in the English literature, the ballads existed first and poetry had its origin later, in the ballads and similar oral folk literature, we find in Tamil, the classical writing to have preceded such popular folk literature.

KOVALAN KATHAI

To give an example. The story of Kōvalan and Kannakī was a classical epic in the name of Silappadhikaram by about the 3rd century A D. In later times, a distorted version of the story of the epic came to be composed as a long ballad and it was enacted in the street open air dramas before a large gathering of rural folk. It was called simply Kōvalan kathai, all the epic values of the original had been thrown to the winds; here we have only an avaricious prostitute, a greedy and fraudulent goldsmith, and a blood thirsty Kannakī crying for vengeance.

The Mahābhārata had lent itself to the rise of scores of ballads, a trivial incident is taken from it and the ballad maker has easily woven round it an intricate ballad story of several thousand lines. Panca Pāṇḍavar vanavāsam and Alli arasāṇi mālai are the most famous of all such ballads.

AMMANAIP-PATTU

The terms ammānai and ammānaip-pāttu seem to have been used to denote what we know by the name of ballads. All the poems noticed here are ammānai poems. Ammānai is a girls' game, played with a number of balls, perhaps these ballads were sung by women and girls, and the name ammānai stuck to them, as if to corroborate this idea, we find in some ballads, the term ammānai ending some lines or passages frequently, used as a sort of refrain. Markandēyar ammānai is a very ancient ballad of the purāṇic type. Citraputran kathai is a similar purāṇic ballad, still popular in the Tanjavur district. Citra-putra is the accountant of Yama, the God of Death. He keeps an account of all the deeds and misdeeds of every individual and brings them up before Yama on the day of final reckoning. People who offer him worship on the Citra pourṇamī day, he lets off lightly.

CLASSES OF BALLADS

Ballads may be of several classes. The purāṇic ballads like the Alli are innumerable. Kōvalan kathai is of the story type. Dēsiṅgu rājan kathai is a historical type; it combines history and legend with a new type of fast moving diction, which has caught the imagination of the people in an arresting grip. The story deals mostly with the exploits of Dēsiṅgu rājan's steed. The style and diction are mostly one of gallop, which makes one get into the spirit of the narrative immediately. The exploits of Kattabomman and his group had given rise to many similar historical ballads, they had only local currency and their great value is historical.

TRAGEDY

Critics generally remark that the Indian literature has no tragedy, that may be true. But Nallatangāl kathai, a social ballad, breathes tragedy from the first line to the last. Wandering minstrels, particularly women, sing this ballad in such a tragic manner, that the householder is easily tempted to give some alms. The story is about the misery caused to a lonely woman and her children, by her elder brother's wife, when out of terrible adversity she goes to his house for shelter. This is a familiar theme and her name, Nallatangāl, is symbolic of the tyranny suffered by a woman at the hands of a brother's wife – the cruelty of a sister-in-law.

SOCIAL REFORM

Kapilar ahaval and Pāyccalūrp-padikam are two popular ballads (or perhaps folk-songs) of the 14th century, on social reform. The first is a rebuke to the brahmin community by the foundling child Kapilar, when orthodox brahmins prohibited the investiture of the sacred thread on him because he was only a foundling brought up by a brahmin and his parentage unknown. Kapilar's rather lengthy poem is a powerful tirade against caste. So also is the Pāyccalūr ballad, where a harijan girl launches forth a powerful attack on the brahmins who obstruct her wedding with a brahmin youth.

Coming to our own times, we know Marumakkal-vali mānmiyam of Desikavīṇayakam Pillai is a social ballad bringing out the tragedy of the marumakkattāyam law, by which inheritance is on the female line. Pillai had contrived to pass it off as ancient classical ballad effectively, its impact on society was so profound that enactment was passed in the state setting right at least some parts of the matriarchal system of inheritance in one community. Murugappa wrote a ballad, Amirtavallu kathai, setting forth the woes of young widows and pleading for widow re-marriage in Hindu society.

LOCAL BALLADS

Isakkı kathai, Sudalaiṁmādan kathai, Madurai Vīran kathai, Kāttavarāyan kathai, Kallalagar ammānai and a host of others are local ballads celebrating local legends and events. A large number of them is popular in the Tirunelveli and Nagercoil areas; they represent a kind of hero worship. Peryannan-chinnannan ballad of the Madras area belongs to this category.

VILLUP-PATTU

The villup-pāttu is another kind of ballad where, along with the singing of the ballad, many instruments, the villu (a large bow) in particular, are played. A large volume of sound is produced which is accompanied by the loud singing of several vocally capable persons together, to attract vast audiences in days which had no electricity and no mike. These served as entertainment and relaxation to entire communities, they extended over the whole night. Villup-pāttu had been composed on all conceivable themes – historical, purāṇic, local, social and religious themes. The modern age has witnessed the Gandhi mahān kathai by Kottamangalam Subbu which is gaining in popularity. Subbu is able to reproduce the spirit of the folklore and folk-song in his composition.

FOLK-SONGS

Folk-songs are the legitimate birth right and legacy of any people, primitive or civilized. We have no collections of ancient folk-songs, but traces of folk-song influence are discernible in Tolkāppiyam and Ṣilappadhikāram. The varip-pāttu and kuravar in the latter are certainly modelled on folk-song and folk dance. The ammānai, ball songs and pestle songs (vallaip-pāttu) found in the epic are all literary forms of the folk-songs of the period. Common folk had been singing their rustic, untutored and spontaneous songs, these had a rhythm and an emotional content and music, and were suited to the action, gifted poets saw and heard these, witnessed the men and women in action, and raised them to the level of literature by adopting the same forms in their own writing. As examples may be cited the undiār, sālal, pūvallī, kōttumbī and similar songs of Tiruvācakam. Such attempts at copying and elevating popular folk-songs had been going on through the centuries. The vallaip-pāttu had not any specific refrain indicating the nature of the action involved, but by the 13th century, a bharani poem employs the refrain summēlo-summulaikkāy (ulakkar is the pestle) for its vallaip-pāṭṭu.

The siddha poems employ the folk-song patterns, particularly Pāmbāṭṭi siddha and Idaikkāṭṭu siddha. Tattuvarāyar who lived at about the same time as these employed the largest number of popular motifs for his poems. To the same period belongs Mūvar ammānai, which is modelled on the ammānai verse usually occurring in the kalambakam poems, where among the girls who are engaged in playing balls, one asks a clever question which is answered by a second with another question; a third replies with a pun which answers both. This kind of folk-song-cum-literary art goes on. In the 19th century, Rāmalinga swāmi has employed a large number of such songs in his devotional outpourings and musical pieces.

LULLABY

The lullaby provides us with very rich folk-song material. Periyālvar perhaps wrote the first lullaby, in pure poetic form. Mothers and grannies throughout the Tamil speaking areas have been coining their own lullabies, to put their babies to sleep. The loving care of the mother often bursts into natural poetry. Many editors have brought out good sized collections of such lullabies. Literary parallels also exist from the old days, on light as well as heavy themes.

NEW TYPES

There have been two remarkable innovations in the 19th century of the folk-song type, which had caught the imagination of the people, the learned and the masses, the moment the poems were written. They are the Kilik-kanni and the Kāvadī-cindu, which are innovations both in poetic form and in presentation.

KILIK-KANNI

The Kilik-kanni is a folk-song type of musical piece which had great popularity in the second quarter of this country. A spiritually inclined head constable in Tirunelvēli, sang a small song of 108 couplets, by the middle of the 19th century, depicting the entreaty of a love-sick maiden to a parrot, asking it to obtain the love of Vēlan (Muruga) for her. Somehow, the yearning, the verse form, its halting movement, and the quaint plaint contained in it brought it immediate popularity. There have been many kīṭk-kann poems by Tāyumānavar and others, but this one is in a class by itself. The man had sung it in an inspired moment; no musical concert today is complete without some songs from it. Bhārati himself has sung one piece on its model. Other modern imitators have not been successful.

KĀVADIC-CINDU

The Kāvadic-cindu is a new type of poem invented by Annāmalai Reddi of Sennikulam in Tirunelvēli district. He was born in the second half of the 19th century. He was a genius in inventing new forms and, like all geniuses, he died young, at the age of 30. He was an ardent devotee of Muruga enshrined at Kalugumalai, and he has sung besides a few minor poems, about 30 verses on Muruga, called the Kāvadic-cindu which have secured for him a significant place in the galaxy of the poets of the modern period. The kāvadi is a well known pole-like contrivance used by the devotee, particularly of Muruga, to carry his offerings of flowers, fruit and milk in a kind of basket at each end. Over the horizontal pole there is generally a semicircular arch, decorated with artistic wood work and also with plaited leaves and flowers. It is balanced on the shoulder. Skilled performers cause the kāvadi to revolve round the neck on both the shoulders, to the admiration and wonder of thousands of onlookers. The Kāvadic-cindu was apparently written by him to enable the devotees to sing them in their often long treks to the temple. Each verse is a separate poem singing the praise of Muruga, the description of the temple and His various exploits.

Most are on the aham theme, on one or more conventional topics of this type of poetry. Here the author has invented a new type of metre, full of repetition, assonance and rhythm, which had helped the kāvadi carriers to sing and dance their way to the presence of their Lord at Kalugumalai. The poems had become instantly popular among all the devotees, throughout the length and breadth of the Tamilnad. Illiterate men as well as educated men and women carry the kāvadi as part of a religious observance and the poem had helped them to overcome the tedium of the journey and the drudgery in carrying the weighty kāvadi on the shoulder. From literary compositions, these poems have now become almost folk-songs whose popularity is unrivalled. Many had been the author's imitators but there has been no one to equal him.

The immensely popular Kilik-kanni and the Kāvadi-cundu were composed within living memory. They only go to prove that the Tamil Muse is still alive, in spite of pedantic academicians, and pulsating with life and vigour, capable of revealing herself in diverse forms and one can never predict in what form and on what subject she will reveal herself to her admirers and children in the future.

OTHER WRITING

There is yet another sector of poetic writing in Tamil which is generally not being considered in any account of Tamil literature. As the volume of such writing is quite large, and as at least a part of it had been existing from an ancient past,¹ even from the 10th century onwards, we are very reluctant to ignore it, we shall here make just a passing reference to it. Like every other class of writing in Tamil, much of this sector also has been lost through neglect.

We have observed elsewhere that all worth-while writing was done in the form of verse by the ancient thinkers. Besides the subjects so far discussed, such as grammar, music, drama, epics, devotional poetry, philosophy and religion, the thinkers had also bestowed their attention on many other subjects. Architecture, astrology, alchemy, chemistry, mathematics, medicine, veterinary science and many others had claimed their attention. Under medicine we find books on such branches as pædiatrics, toxicology, surgery and ophthalmology, and on pulse reading, on diseases of the lungs and the skin, and on diabetes, leprosy, fevers etc.

An old verse bemoans the fact that many valuable books on several subjects had been swallowed up by the sea when it made incursions into the land on the coasts of Tamīlād; the subjects of such books

mentioned therein are academic subjects such as logic, prosody and economics, philosophical subjects such as yoga and concentration, arts such as painting and music, sciences such as mathematics, geology and metallurgy, quasi-sciences such as alchemy and water-divining, black arts like magic, the art of paralysing another and the art of causing another's death by incantation, and warfare

The writers often assume such names as Agastīya, Bhōga, Dhanvantrī and Tīrumūlar. The body of their writing is very vast. They gain weight when one or another of them is quoted by some of the ancient literary commentators like Adiyārkkū nallār and Naccinārkkiniyar.

Jinēndramālar,² a book on astrology, and Kanā-nūl,³ a book on dreams, both quoted by the Silappadhikāram commentators, are fully available today. So also is Siddhar-ārūdam,⁴ a book on toxicology, and Kanakkadhikāram,⁵ a book on mathematics, are available in print. Drēkkānam,⁶ an astrological treatise of the 10th century is lost, but another of the 12th century, *Ullamudaiyān*⁷ is available. Many books of Tēraiṇar, a brain surgeon, are available. There were books for treating not only cattle diseases, but also the diseases of horses and of elephants, (this is understandable, because in the Tamīlnad of a thousand years ago, the ruling princes had divisions of cavalry and of elephants,) these books have not yet been printed.

There has been a book on painting, mentioned in the Silappadhikāram commentary,⁸ but the book is not available. A Pandiya prince wrote a book on the science of erotics ⁹ There was also a book on chess ¹⁰ A large number of books on the various branches of medicine are still available in print and in manuscript

There seem to have been books on gem evaluation, on safeguards against stealing, ¹¹ books on soothsaying by reference to the quivering in parts of the body and on palmistry are available today. No aspect of human life or activity has been left untouched by the writers. Those books may not be real literature, they are just mentioned here to show the variety, range and antiquity of this class of writing.

References

- 1 Vide my History 10th century, page 365 – Table.
2. Jinendramalai, quoted by the earlier commentator on Silappadhikaram page 443, 1927 edition, Aycciyar kuravar, and by Naccinarkkiniyar on Cintamani
- 3 Adiyarkku nallar quotes four verses from the Kana-nul Adaikkalak-kathai, lines 25, 106, Kana-nul is published by the Madurai Tamil Sangham in 1920 (II edition)
- 4 Siddhar-arudam, published by Gurusamik-konar in 1916. mentioned by Naccinarkkiniyar in his commentary on Cintamani, verse 1287, Swaminatha Ayyar's edition.
- 5 Printed in 1872 in the Vivekavilakkam press
- 6 Quoted by Tapparunkala virutti olipiyal, vide pages 552-555, my History of Tamil Literature, 10th century.
- 7 Vide my History 11th century, pages 455-6
- 8 Ibid pages 369-70, Adiyarkku nallar on Venul-kathai, line 25. On the other hand, all the artisans had written their manuals on sculpture in the Sanskrit language
- 9 Kokkoham by Varatungarama Pandiya, printed 19th c. Naccinarkkiniyar mentions a Kamanul Cintamani 2700
- 10 Published in the pages of the Sen-Tamil, Madurai
- 11 Vide the commentaries on line 634 of Madurak-kanji, and line 166 of Silappadhikaram, Kolaikkalak-kathai.

CHRISTIAN WRITERS

Christian missionaries followed in the footsteps of the conquering European armies into all parts of India. They had the authority of the army behind them in their conversion. The ecclesiastical department of the British Indian Government maintained them. Given funds and force, their conversion work grew apace and to aid them in their work, they introduced printing and a simplified manner of Tamil prose writing. It should be remembered that the ecclesiastical department was itself maintained by the India Government's budget.

FOREIGN WRITERS

De Nobili, the Italian Jesuit Missionary, was perhaps the first important introducer of Tamil prose, of course solely with the proselytizing purpose. He wrote many simple Christian dialectical manuals.

Next came Beschi, who adopted the Tamil name Vīramā munivar. He lived in the early part of the 18th century in the Tīrunelvēli district. All his work was motivated by the proselytizing zeal. Supradīpa kavirāyar was a gifted poet of the period, who first enjoyed the patronage of the Nīlakkōttai zamindar and then of the Ariyalūr Maḷavarāyar. When the fortunes of the latter were at a low ebb, he had to leave him. By then he had become not only old and destitute, but also blind. Beschi took him over as his teacher, extended his patronage to him and made him, an instrument for all his literary activities and for the production of his proselytizational literature. As Supradīpa had no one to look after him, Beschi's offer was a godsend to him. All the works that go by the name of Beschi were the works of Supradīpa. Tēmbavanī, Catur aharādi, Tonnūl Vīlakkam, Paripūrana gurukathai and a host of others were all the work of Supradīpa.

It was quite normal in those days for a poet to issue his work in the name of his patron. The suggestion for each book might have been Beschi's, but the entire work in each case was Supradīpa's. Poor and helpless, handicapped by his blindness, and absolutely broken down by infirmity, he did all the work out of gratitude to the man who helped him to pass his last days as a decent human being. The poet was a genius in torment physically, economically and intellectually, and so he jumped at the idea, when he was offered relief and peace on all these counts. It should be remembered that no foreigner could grasp the thoughts that go into the making of Catur aharādi or Tonnūl Vīlakkam. Even a Tamilian scholar of average intelligence could not have made them; only a genius like the blind poet was a match for them.

The next great contribution to the world of Tamil thought in language and grammar came from Caldwell, another missionary practising in Tirunelvēlī. In spite of its many faults, his book of Comparative Dravidian Philology in English is a very important piece of constructive analytical work. He has also written one or two Christian tracts G U Pope, the translator of Tiruvācakam, Kural and Nāladī is the next important figure He was so much moved by the poetic expression and self-surrender of Mānikkavācakar that he took immense pains to introduce him to the English reader His translation of this book as well as of Kural, Nāladī and some portions of Pura nanūru are classics of early attempts by foreigners to fathom the poetic, ethical and devotional expressions of the Tamilians In his introduction to Tiruvācakam, he has also translated Tiru-arul-payan of Umāpati, which is a Śaiva scripture Without any fear of contradiction we may say that the greatest service to the cause of Tamil and also of the Śaiva religion was rendered by this one man, who caused the words 'Here lies a student of Tamil' to be engraved over his grave

The list of contributions from foreigners will not be complete without a mention of Winslow In the middle of the 19th century, he compiled a Tamil-English dictionary, with the help of several illustrious Tamil scholars It is a very large volume and gives many familiar Tamil phrases and their English equivalents It was a good attempt at recording many a colloquial expression, and in this respect it was a great help to the modern Tamil lexicon. The Tamil phrases of Winslow were, however, omitted in the lexicon.

TAMILIANS

Two Tamilian writers require special mention here The first is Vedanayakam pillai, Munsif at Mayuram and an ardent admirer of Minakshisundaram pillai. Though he wrote many sectarian poems, he is now remembered chiefly for three works of a non-sectarian character. His prose work Pratāpa Mudaliyār Caritram is a novel, modelled on the English works, but it was written more as a prose-purāṇa, its importance lies only in its prose style. His Nītinūl is a didactic work on the model of such books of the early years, but it has never had any currency. His Sarva samaya samarasa kīrttanai, musical pieces on the model of the masters of the period, is a brave attempt at preaching universal ethics and piety through music. But he strives for rhyme and alliteration and the pieces do not possess the least emotional content or lyrical quality.

The other writer is Krishna pillai, who was a good scholar in all Tamil literature and grammar. At the age of thirty he turned Christian and translated Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress into Tamil. He came of an orthodox Vaisnava sect and was a good versifier, but he was a soul in torment materially, and so spat out such venom against the Vaisnava cult which is rarely to be met with elsewhere.

MUSLIM WRITERS

The Muslims in Tamilnad had not come from Arabia they had embraced Islam recently or some generations back, when the Muslims invaded this part of the country and made their conversions at the point of the sword. They are all Tamilians and naturally, the gifted among them could produce literature, given the occasion and the urge. Many of them had been pupils under illustrious Tamil men of letters of the period and had bloomed in time into men of letters, themselves. Umaruppulavar wrote Sīrāp-purānam, giving the life of prophet Mohammed on an epic scale in the 17th century under the patronage of Sīdakkādi a muslim patron of letters. It is a very large work running to over five thousand verses. He left it incomplete it was completed by a later writer. The poet had never left the shores of the Pāndiya coast and so he had no vision of the Arabian desert. His Mecca and Arabia are all copies of the Pāndiyan territory.

Several versifiers had tried their hand at didactic writing. Namar labbai Alim is one such. He wrote Svarganīti, running to 33 verses, in close imitation of Ulaganīti, a later didactic poem, which used to be popular among primary school children in the past. This poem preaches universally acceptable codes of conduct, concluding each verse with an exhortation to the heart 'to praise the husband of Katija'. The same author's Adaikkala mālai of 50 verses, surrendering himself to Allah, is a good string of verses, modelled on the Adaikkalap-pattu of Tiruvācakam. Mohammed Hussain wrote the Penbuddhi Mālai, prescribing a code of conduct for women.

Many Muslim writers had written about the wars waged by the prophet and his followers, in long verses of the ballad type. They were all written by about the end of the 18th century. Some of them are long poems, running to over 800 couplets. As an example may be cited the Ibn-iyantan-padaippōr written by Aliyār-pulavar son of Kanda pillai in 1830 and printed in 1893.

Mohaddin purānam by Mohammed Ibrahim (called Vannak-kalañjiyap-pulavar) earned for him recognition and vast material benefits besides. One Shihabuddin wrote the sayings of the prophet in about 1200 verses, towards the close of the 17th century. Javvādup-pulavar was a popular writer who wrote many vannams and similar difficult verses. Labbai alim had sung many Tiruppuhal verses on the prophet.

There was a recluse muslim in Madras by the opening years of the 20th century, known by the name Mastan Sahib of Gunamkudi. He has written more than 1000 verses, long and short, craving for the grace of Mohammed as the guru. He had read very widely in the spiritual and devotional writings in Tamilnad, particularly those of Tāyumānavar, and naturally his songs reflect the form, terminology and thought-modes of that saint. His songs were popular among a certain class of people in the opening decades of this century.

Thus it may be seen that the gifted and capable Tamil muslims had tried their hand at the various branches of Tamil writing. But taken together, there does not seem to be any great contribution from them towards the advancement of the language or its literature, they have no doubt been responsible for the infiltration of many Arabic and Urdu words into the written language.

THE POETS

A few lines about the poets in general may not be out of place in this short survey. Later literary tradition makes out the poets to be of four categories; the kavi – the poet who can sing poems of the four distinct categories, the gamaka – he who can expound well even unfamiliar poetry before an audience of eminent scholars, the vāṭi – he who can firmly establish his own views after refuting alien thoughts, and the vāṅki – he who can skilfully write poems on all the four goals of life. The kavi of the four categories is āsu kavi – he who can compose extempore verses on any subject under any conditions, madhura kavi – he who can compose poems in sweet and mellifluous language, citra kavi – he who can compose poems with intricate letter, sound or word arrangements, and vittāra kavi – he who can compose elaborate and long poems. This sort of elaboration has been adapted in Tamil poetics from the 9th century

The Sangham poetry and the early epics had not known this classification. By their own standards, we may say that the sangham poems were perhaps all of the madhura kavi type, the other three types were not known then. We have been having vittāra kavi and citra kavi definitely from the seventh century; but the concept of āsu kavi had taken shape only later, with the advent of Kālamēgham.

When we survey the galaxy of the men of letters of the period of two thousand years, we find there the representatives of all classes of society. Princes had been writers in the sangham age, such as Neduñceliyan, Perum-kadumkō, in the later period such as Sēramān perumāl, Kulasēkhara, Gandarāditta, still later like the Tenkāśi Pāndiya family, queens such as the Queen of Bhūta pāndiya. The earlier chapters have shown that they hailed from all the religious creeds, the Śaiva and the Vaisnava, the Jaina and the Buddha, the Christian and the Muslim. Most have been householders but we also have ascetics like Ilangō, Tīru Takka dēvar and Sīvaparakāśa swami. All have been theistic writers but there were also iconoclasts like some Siddhas. The common belief is that poets had been poor, but the names of the princely poets, and the list of court poets like Jayamkondār, Ottakkūttar, Sēkkilār and many others, belies this statement. Some there have been who decried woman but the general run of poets had not been so. Many had been hunters and warriors as well who had sung great poetry, gipsies had written poetry. According to tradition, very young persons also had written poetry. There have been instances where the father and the son had been poets. We find here persons from all classes, the merchants, princes, ministers, doctors, and brahmins. Women from all classes also take a legitimate share in the writing.

Many poets who lived at different times appear to have borne the same name – such as Agastya, Arvai, Kapila, Parana, Nakkīra, Perum dēva, Kallāda and Pērāsiriyar.

Social or physical handicaps had never hindered the writing of poetry and the recognition of its greatness. Tiruppānālvar in the Vaisnava canon and Sēndanār in the Saiṣa canon, both harijans, have written wonderful devotional poetry. Vilāncōlaip-pillai, a harijan, wrote a short philosophical treatise; he is today an acārya in the southern sect of Vaisnavism and his poem of seven verses forms part of the Tenkalar Vaisnava prayer book. These come from the lowest castes.

The Irattaiyar tradition is one of a lame poet and a blind poet moving about in the country, one aiding the other and singing duets as occasional verses and as devotional poems. Mudat-Tāmakkanni and Mudat-Tirumāran were perhaps lame, hence the prefix muda (lame). Mudat-Tāmakkanni was a woman and the other a prince of the Pāndiya dynasty. Muda-mōsiyār and Aiyūr Mudavanār were also poets who were lame. Mōsiyār had sung the short beautiful verse on Āy 'Āy is not the businessman who trades good deeds in this birth for a better deal in the next; he follows the righteous path only because all noble souls before had gone that path.'

A classic instance is Antahak-kavi Vīrarāghava, the blind poet, who had written many good minor poems, he says of himself that he wrote billions of pages not on palm leaves but on the 'leaf of his heart' and studied them. Talaimalai kanda dēva, author of Marudūr antādi, was also a blind poet. An equally well known poet of the next century was Supradīpa kavirāya who wrote hundreds of pages in various fields, for the sake of his benefactor Beschi. Māmbalak-kavi was another blind poet who had written many minor poems. He lived in the middle of the 19th century and was patronised by many local chiefs. His songs were so much liked that he was given the title Kavi-singam, Lion among poets. In our own times, Asalāmbikai ammai wrote thousands of her verses, metrical biographies of Gandhī, Tilak and Ramalinga, even when she was struck down with a dire disease. We know Desikavīṇayakam pillai wrote some of his sweet poems, when he was being consumed by an ugly and virulent form of eczema.

There are some oft repeated legends regarding poets, and untrue though they are, we would like to mention them if only for the sake of their popularity. It is doubtful if they reflect any credit on the poets concerned, we do not mean the legends are true. One is associated with Nakkīrar and the second verse of Kuruntohai. A Pāṇḍiya prince had a doubt in his mind whether the fragrance emanating from the tresses of his queen was natural to them or whether it came from the flowers she wore. He announced that he would award a purse of gold to the person who could read his mind and give him the correct answer. Of course no one could do it. There was a poor brahmin devotee of Śiva who had prayed to Him for some gold for his marriage expenses. Śiva of Madurai gave him this verse to be shown to the Prince. The Prince was satisfied and so gave the award to the poor man. But the head poet of the Madurai Sangham, Nakkīrar, stopped him saying that the human hair had no fragrance apart from that of the flowers worn on it. Śiva appeared before him as the poet, the author of the verse; yet Nakkīrar did not yield. When the poet showed his true form as Śiva, Nakkīrar still did not go back on his position. Though he incurred the wrath of Śiva, he would not yield. This incident has made the story a great legend to show that a man of letters in Tamil could never be intimidated.

Another story is about inferior poets. It says that a high standard in Tamil poetry was maintained and when false poets came up with their inferior writing, Pillaip-Pāndiya (probably Ativīrarāma) knocked him on the head, Villiputtūrar scooped up his ears and cut off his tongue, Ottakkūttar tied up the tufts of such poets in pairs and cut off their heads.

The fiction about Śittalai Sāttanār is equally well known. He was said to be a poet of a high order with a sensitive ear to poetry, whenever he heard false poetry, he used to knock on his own head with his stylus, this caused a puss-infested wound on his head which did not heal, because there was always such bad poetry. Only when he heard Kural, he did not knock on his head, and then the wound had time to heal. This story finds a place in Tiruvalluva malai of the 11th century. The term Śittalai, in the name of this poet, is said to mean puss-headed, but unfortunately, it is the name of his village. The whole story is mere myth.

There are still more such stories and they all do not redound to the credit of the Tamil Muse.

Popularity which some poets of the past had enjoyed not only with learned people but also with semi-literates, is something which is really unaccountable. As an instance, we may mention Avvai, Kālamēgham and Irattaiyar. Avvai of course was a great poet who had endeared herself to people of all age groups and at all social levels, by her pithy songs ; her popularity is understandable. But the popularity of the others stands on a different footing. These were not great poets of the calibre of Avvai, who could give expression to the wisdom of the ages – wisdom which can help mankind for all time. But they were masters of words, of pun, assonance and rhyme, and a trick of words and a twist of expression, which made them capable of breathing hot and cold in the same breath, of touching the most ludicrous and voicing the most sublime in the same set of words. This skill had made their verses enjoyable for all people.

WOMEN POETS

In the world of letters predominated by the male species, it may indeed be of interest to assess the achievements of the female. We have of course the story of Kannakī, the meek and aggrieved heroine of Puhār, who became a violent fighter in Madurai on the unjust execution of her husband, and burnt that city, went west and became a celestial in Vanjī. This is mere story, it is not fact nor history. So also is the story of Manimēkhalai, Kundalakēśi, Nīlakēśi and a host of others. These were not writers. The illustrious Pandiya Queen Mangaiyarkk-arasi, a historical figure, is celebrated in legend and history, but is not a writer.

THE SANGHAM PERIOD

We have indeed poetesses hailing from the earliest period from which poetry is available to us now. Thirtytwo women poets are said to have sung poems in the four anthologies, Aha nānūru, Kuruntohai and Nārrinai (on love) and Purananūru (on peace and war). Several have been given the title the good, such as Nap-pasalai, Nak-kannai, Nac-cellai (na is the prefix for the good). There had been two women poets having the name Kākkai-pādini the Elder and the Younger, and both had written grammatical treatises on poetics. The poems of several of these women poets are found in all the anthologies. The foremost is of course Avvai, the relentless old bard who does not spare prince or peasant, but still is sought after by all. Her songs here number 59. Her poems on the theme of love mostly deal with the pangs of separation. She had great affection for the petty chief Adhikan and her songs, sung when she was sent as an ambassador to the other princes' courts by Adhikan, strike terror into the hearts of the enemies. We still wonder how a woman, and an old woman at that, could sing such power-laden war songs, which swing and deal hammer-like blows.

Special mention may be made of Mudat-Tāmakanni, who sang Porunar-ārruppadaḷ, on King Karikāla, and Kākkai-pāḍini Nac-cellai who sang ten verses on Prince Adukōtpāttu Sēralāda, who presented her with nine weights of gold for making trinkets and one hundred thousand gold coins besides.

Not less important are a few women poets, who are gems in their own right. The poem sung by the widow of Prince Bhūta Pāndiya, sung at the time of his funeral, when the courtiers tried to dissuade her from giving up her life on her husband's death, are like tongues of fire, lapping up all those that come near, in her biting sarcasm against a life of widowhood. Okkūr Māsātti, Ponmudi and Kāval pendu have sung poems of heroism and valour about which any son and any nation can be proud. High placed daughters of the patron Pāri and some low placed gipsy clan women have also sung sweet songs.

THE CANONS

We mentioned Mangaiyarkk-araṣi, a canonised saint but not a poet. But Karaikkāl ammai, a canonised saint was also a poet Her songs form part of the Śaiva canon She lived some centuries earlier than Appar and Sambandha, and her songs are not only sweet and elegant poetry, but express the perennial philosophy of love and service to God. Her love of God is simply the fond expression of the child's love to its mother "I long to bow before my Lord and perform manual service to him I shall not accept even if the worlds are gifted to me I am proud because I have the good fortune to bow before Śiva, and place floral offerings at His feet, and praise His devotees and be His slave" Love of fellow beings is a refreshing message from Amma's songs having great significance to the modern world.

Equally important are the songs of Āndāl from the Vaisnava canon She is even considered to be the greatest woman poet and saint Her songs are really the love songs of a woman pining for the love of God and for union with him The love-sick maiden Āndāl performs in her songs a detailed worship for Manmata, the god of love Her description of her wedding with her Lord in a dream is unique in Tamil, and is most moving Her Tiruppāvai song, depicting the bathing of a group of virgins in the month of Mārgaḷi, praying for suitable grooms for themselves, and for rain and prosperity for the land, is deservedly considered her greatest contribution to Tamil poetry. Her songs have influenced the Tamil people profoundly and still continue to do so. This theme has also been utilised by Saint Manikkavacakar Service to God is the one keynote of the songs The pāvai song has travelled to distant Siam (Thailand) beyond the seas by the Tamil settlers there and is still sung there as part of a religious rite.

THE LATER PERIOD

There have been many poetesses of the name of Avvai in different periods. One such is more well known than the Avvai mentioned earlier and she is the most popular even among the unlettered masses. She is the reputed author of the several ethical works Āttisūdi, Konraivēndan, Mūdurai and Nalvali. Most of her sayings have passed into the popular folk-lore of the Tamil people. Not only was she a great poetess but she was the one unequalled and unrivalled poet of the masses. All unlettered village folk, men and women, daily utter a number of her sayings in the course of their ordinary business. She always says simple things like revere your mother and father as God, worship in the temple, obey your elders, learn while you are young, speak with humility even to the lowly, extend help to your kin, do not expose your weakness even to your best friend, think well before you act, not killing is the best penance, the best food is that obtained through one's own labour, always pray to God, do not be idle, banish pettiness, remove ignorance, and do not rob a public trust. All these have been uttered by her in the simplest yet most poetic form, in two words or four words. Her poetry and her philosophy of life, though of the highest in expression and the most broad-based in life, is yet bound up with the normal experiences of the average man, woman and child, hence their eternal appeal to the mass mind. The whole of Nalvali is concerned with the higher reaches of philosophy, but yet is expressed in a manner intelligible to the common man.

The unusual brilliance of this Avvai has in a sense completely shut out poetry from womankind and we may say that after her there have been no women poets at all. Jain nuns known to commentators as Kaunti have tried their hand at introducing interpolations in classics like Paripādal and Cintāmani. There was one Ammaicci much later who crossed swords with Andakak-kavi Vīrarāghavar. There was also the Queen of Prince Varatungarāma Pāndiya who rebuked Ativīrarama's Naidatam. In the 20th century we had Asalāmbikai Ammai, who was a gifted and prolific writer. Decades earlier she had written metrical biographies of Ramalinga swami, Tīlak and Gandhi, called Ramalinga Purānam, Tīlaka Purānam and Gandhi Purānam, but because of the political turmoils in the Tamilnad, she had not received the recognition that was her due. Yet we do not come across any outstanding woman poet in later literature.

TAMIL PROSE

Prose is the form of the natural expression of thought by beings who have been endowed with the gift of speech. Language is an instrument for communicating the thought of one human being to another. When man first acquired this instrument, he spoke as thoughts arose in his mind, to the extent it was possible for him to translate them into words. Gradually, as society developed and as his thinking and expressing faculties expanded, beauty was added to speech and this resulted in artistic expression, this was poetry. Beautiful thoughts can be expressed by any one, given the urge and the feeling, but to give them a form, training and culture are necessary. Poetry is not mere word, nor mere thoughts. It is the best thought, in the most suitable words, and given the most beautiful form, it is form that makes poetry.

WHY POETRY

Early man did not feel any need to write down anything. Only when artistic expression was developed, the composer of that expression, poetry, desired to write it down. Writing was difficult. In the old days, palmyrah leaf had to be prepared and the matter had to be written on it with a steel stylus. This difficulty of writing necessitated only valuable matter to be written down. Hence whatever was considered valuable was given a poetic form and written down Besides, the work involved in opening a manuscript book and in tying it up, made people commit to memory all valuable things written down; the written word in the book served only as a source of refreshing the memory or of reference. Prose was not easy to memorise and hence we find there was no prose material written down There was no systematic work, small or big, in prose, that was written down.

EARLY PROSE

The passages of a few lines in the Silappadhikāram which we find in the name of katturai or *uraippāttu madai*¹ is also a form of rhythmic writing, having the usual poetic features of alliteration, assonance and rhyme, it is not called poetry, because it does not have the measured rigidity of the poetic lines Such passages cannot be said to be prose, they are not renderings of the language as it was spoken The language of the commentaries on grammar and literature is perhaps the first specimen of prose, the language as it was spoken, it may be simple or involved, it may be quite a natural style or may be ornamental, but yet it is prose, because the writer wants to convey some thought in a direct manner. The first such prose writing is the Iraiyānār kalaviyal commentary² It is a very ornate prose, but yet it is prose indeed

The fragment of *Perundēvanār Bhāratam*³ as we have it today contains prose passages strewn between verses, to serve the purpose of continuity in the story, they are no doubt an integral part of the book But the author here makes profuse use of Sanskrit and the whole reminds us today of the *kathā kālaksēpam*⁴ form of narrative.

COMMENTARIES

Two early writers who used simple prose in their commentaries are Ilampūranar and Mānakkudavar. Their commentaries on *Tolkāppiyam*⁵ and *Kural*⁶ are always in easy simple style. They generally write in short sentences and do not employ any involved construction. They do not exclude Sanskrit words, but their number is limited. The writing is always clear and to the point, without any flashes or figures. The other commentators worth mentioning are the writer of Yāpparunkala vūṭṭi,⁷ Adiyārkkunallār⁸, Perun-dēvanār (Vīrasōliyam),⁹ Parimēlalagar¹⁰, Sēnāvaraiyar,¹¹ Pērāsiriyaṉ and Naccinārkkiniyaṉ¹². Of these, the first three writers are fully engrossed with their subject, they have so much to tell, that they have no time to pause to embellish their writing. Often Adiyārkkunallār uses some assonance, but mostly, his style is a dignified and direct style. Parimēlalagar often brings to bear his vast erudition on his writing which occasionally gets padded and involved. The other three are commentators on Tolkāppiyam. The very nature of their writing does not permit them to be anything but lucid and effective. Sēnāvaraiyar is often descriptive. Naccinārkkiniyaṉ is an ocean of scholarship which is reflected in his writing. His style is neither ornate nor simple but yet elegant and lucid.

MANIPRAVALA

Contemporaneous with these writers, there was another school of commentary writers who had carved out an altogether new path for themselves. They are the Vaiṣṇava vyākhyāna writers. From the days of Rāmānuja down to the days of Manavāla-mā-muniṅal, there have been a score of writers who wrote many glosses on the Vaiṣṇava canon. The first such writer was Tiruk-kurugaip-pirāṇ Pillān¹³, who wrote his gloss, the Ārāyirappadi, on Nammālvār's Tiruvāymoli. Here, the sentence construction was no doubt Tamil, but most of the religious terms, nominal inflexions and phrases were completely Sanskrit. The characteristic of the writing is an expression of poetic appreciation; it also served as a vehicle for the conveyance of philosophic thought. The writers like him thought and breathed Sanskrit, though their nourishing ground was Nammālvār's Tamil, and hence their language. It acquired a special name the maṇipravāla, gem and coral. Pillān's Ārāyirappadi (six thousand) was the fore-runner of this school which reached its consummation in the 36 thousand of Nampillai, written down by Vadakku Tiruvīdip-pillai¹⁴. In manuscripts and printed texts, the Sanskrit words and letters are printed in the grantha character, hence one not familiar with Sanskrit and with the grantha script, cannot even read it, let alone understand, and what is worse, the early publishers of these commentaries, financed by pious Telugu knowing Vaiṣṇavas around Madras, printed the Sanskrit words in the Telugu script, with the result that a non-Telugu script knowing Tamil scholar can hardly even decipher the vyākhyāna!

Certain classes of chettis and others who had settled in Madras some centuries back were very ardent followers of the Rāmānuja cult. They understood the Tamil language but did not know the Tamil script. So they had the entire Nalāyiram and the whole range of its commentaries and allied literature written by the Vaiṣṇava ācāryas which was in maṇipravāla printed in the Telugu script, and used it for their reading. But for their printing in the Telugu script, it is quite likely some of the manīpravāla Vaiṣṇava works would have been lost. Even today, some of those books are available only in the Telugu script, they had not been printed in the Tamil script.

Some call the grantha script the gīrvana (literally the language of the gods), the term however is understood to apply generally to the language and not to the script.

The manīpravāla was taken up by the Jain writers who always desired to exhibit a flair for Sanskrit. *Jīva sambhōdana*¹⁵, a Jain philosophic work written in prose and venbā verse, employs the manīpravāla for the prose portion and in this it does not lag behind the Vaiṣṇava writers. The second is *Srī Purāṇa*¹⁶, a large and valued scriptural text of the Jains, written wholly in the manīpravāla style. It is perhaps the only large complete prose work, outside the field of commentaries. The Śaivas never attempted this style excepting the solitary instance of Śivāgra Yōgi's Siddhīyār commentary¹⁷ of a later date.

SAIVA WRITERS

Prose writing now enters another phase in its evolution. Unlike the Vaiṣṇava writers, the Śaiva śāstra commentators had employed from the very early period (14th century) a clear and simple style to expound their philosophy. There have also been a score of such writers who had written both commentaries and critical works. These commentary writers are so numerous and are such great personalities that it is not possible to single out any for special mention.

Yet we shall mention one Sivajñāna swami, a great figure in later Śaiva dialectics is one such. He wrote many prose works and commentaries, he always employed a very hard style using archaic forms, a stinging sarcasm and a biting humour. His works were generally characterised by a violent attack on the alien schools and his language consequently is very pungent and biting. But generally, all these Śaiva writings are characterised by lucidity and a logical forcefulness, while being dialectical also. The difference in style between the Vaiṣnavas and the Śaivas is also explainable from the fact that the Vaiṣnava writers were all Śrī Vaiṣnava brahmīns, while the Śaiva writers were all Śaiva velālas, hence the preponderance of the Sanskrit element in the former.

PRINTING

With the advent of the proselytizing work of the Christian missionaries and of the printing machine, Tamil prose again enters an altogether different phase in its history. Prose was employed by them in printing their tracts for religious conversion and from then on modern Tamil prose began to take root. The Jesuit writers of those days secured the aid of indigent Tamil poets and flooded the land with plenty of printed prose material. In time, printing found its way into non-Christian quarters also and we find here the beginnings of modern Tamil prose.

THE 19th CENTURY

We now come to the 19th century, a period of abundant literary production in all spheres – prose, poetry, grammar, lexicon, musical pieces, drama and opera, journalistic writing, devotional poems, purānas other minor poems, essays and even story writing. Naturally prose played a large part in the creative activity of the period. Tāndavarāya mudaliyār, author of *Pancatantram*¹⁸ (prose) is the first important figure. Although he can write an easy and picturesque style, his sentences and construction are long drawn out. Vīrāsami Cettiṃyār is remembered by his *Vinōda rasa manjari*¹⁹ containing many funny (vinōda) stories about some very eminent men of letters of the last one thousand years, like Kambar. Unfortunately, Tamil critics and research workers had forgotten that his book never professed to be factually true but only aimed at being funny, at providing entertainment. Rāmalinga swāmi, author of thousands of devotional verses, had written a few prose works like Manumurai kanda vācakam and Jīvakārunya olukkam (the path of compassion)²⁰. He employs innumerable proverbs and, although his language is simple, he is often verbose and goes on padding his thoughts merely for the sound effect.

ARUMUKHA NAVALAR

With relief we turn to Ārumukha Nāvalar, rightly hailed as the father of modern prose. He wrote on ethical and religious subjects and has presented many lengthy purānas in easy readable elegant Tamil. The most famous are the prose versions of Kanda purāna, Periya purāna and *Tiruvilaiyadal purāna*²¹. He also wrote four graded readers wherein he laid down codes of ethical conduct for school going children. In the middle class families in South India, he was quite a powerful force upto the first quarter of the present century. His writing was always easy and elegant, direct and lucid, but there was such a compelling urge and urgency in it that the unsophisticated householder of those days could not but act as he directed, so far as a personal moral code was concerned.

NAMASIVĀYA MUDALIYĀR

With Ārumukha Nāvalar, prose had come into its own and we now close the 19th century and enter upon the present. The one man who should be remembered with gratitude by the Tamilians for releasing the Tamil muse from her fetters, in the matter of prose in the 20th century is Namaśivāya mudaliyār. He was a pandit in a girls' college, and moving with young girls had conditioned his writing. He made his style always direct, simple and not verbose, elegant but not flowery, rich but not ornate. His thoughts were simple and he employed a simple and forceful style to convey them to young minds. He had always something to say, he said it and stopped. Even today his school books²² are models of good Tamil prose. Men and women, who are today past sixty years, may be able to recall the joy they derived from studying his class readers in school.

It should be remembered that we are not singling out Nāvalar and Mudaliyār as the only writers of good Tamil prose. Many could certainly have written good prose during their days. We are not, however, concerned here with all good prose, rather we desire to point out the unique prose writers whose writing had influenced and shaped later prose writing most. It is our conviction that these two, during their respective periods and in their fields, were the greatest moulders of prose which served as a model for all future prose writing.

Pet likes and dislikes and aversions are so very pronounced these days, not only because of personal preferences, but mostly because of political regimentation, a diehard conservatism, an ugly scramble for the crumbs thrown out by educational bodies in the form of selection of books, and similar other extraneous causes. We would therefore refrain from commenting upon the 20th century writing altogether ²³

References

- 1 Silappadhikaram, Dr Swaminatha Aiyar's edition 1927, pages 30, 542, 573
- 2 Iravayanar Akapporul, C R Namasivaya Mudaliyar
3. Perundevanar Bharata venba, edited by A Gopala Aiyar 1925
- 4 Katha kalakshepam - religious discourse given out with music before a large audience.
- 5 Tolkappiyam Ilampuranam, V O Chidambaram Pillai, Eluttu 1927, Porul 1936
6. Tirukkural, Manakkudavar urai, Ponnuswami Nattar edition 1925
- 7 Tapparungalam, edited by Bhavanandam pillai 1916
- 8 Silappadhikaram, Aiyar's edition 1927
- 9 Virasoliyam, Perundevanar's commentary, K. R Govindaraja mudaliyar 1942.
- 10 Tirukkural, Parimelalagar's commentary, Arumukha navalar, many editions
11. Tolkappiyam Solladhikaram, Senavaraiyam, Damodaram pillai's edition 1886
- 12 Tolkappiyam Porul adhikaram, Kanakasabhapati pillai's edition 1934-35.

- 13 The Arayirappadi of Pillan in Bhagavat vishayam.
- 14 The Idu in Bhagavat Vishayam
- 15 Jiva sambhodanai, Purnacandra sastrı 1957
- 16 Sri Puranam edited by Venkatarajulu Reddiyar, University of Madras 1943.
- 17 Siddhiyar, Aruvar Urai edited by K. Shanmukha sundara Mudaliyar 1897
- 18 Pancatantram of Tandavaraya Mudaliyar, many editions.
- 19 Vinoda rasa manjarı of Virasami chettıyar, 1917
- 20 Ramalingaswami, Manumurai kanda vacakam, many editions
- 21 Arumukha Navalar Sarva Vidyanyupalana press
- 22 C. R. Namasivaya Mudaliyar, Tamil Readers 1-7, and New Tamil Readers, 1915 to 1923. We would strongly recommend his writing to the modern State Text Book makers
- 23 Those interested may glance through my Tamil book 'Tamil prose style of Today' published in 1945, and long out of print

THE TAMIL SCRIPT

With the evolution of the type-writing and printing techniques, and of the vast advances made in the newspaper printing trade, it has been found necessary to modify and reform the script in which the Tamil language is written at present. This reform is found very essential both for speed and for conservation of space. Newspapers are always racing for time, and conservation of space is necessary because space has become very costly. On the two counts, reform of the Tamil script has been felt to be very urgent and imperative. We do not propose to go into the question of reform here, because it is a very vexing question which has taxed the brains all people - scholars, administrators, newspaper men and printers. A satisfactory solution is yet to be found.

But in order to give a fullness to the history of literature in this survey, we shall give here a short account of the evolution of the Tamil script. The history of the script is still in the making, and the final word on the subject has not been said.

Writing varies from language to language, from region to region, and even from person to person. It also varies with the material on which it is written, such as stone, copper plate or palm leaf, and now of course paper. The writer's own sense of art and his own dexterity of the fingers influenced the form of the script. The tool of writing – the stylus, the pen or pencil, besides the fingers – had also a part in shaping the writing. Writing speed and the idiosyncrasies of the scribe also affected the shape of the letters in the writing. Certain languages and scripts are written from the right to the left. But the majority of languages and scripts are written only from the left to the right (clockwise).

THE SOURCES

For a knowledge of the early scripts, only a few sources are available to us. They are the following. Stone royal inscriptions of grants in the temple walls and the like. (Hero-stones may also be included in this category) Copper plate royal grants recorded on copper plates. Both these are contemporary writing and always dated. Potsherds, broken pots etc. discovered during archaeological excavations, these are all undated and their date has to be fixed, but such sources are very few. Palm leaf palm leaf manuscripts of ancient books are available at best probably for the last five hundred years. These are not writing contemporary with the writing of the book. they are merely copies of the copies of the original. Earlier and ancient manuscript palm leaves cannot be had, because the best palm leaves can exist only for a period of three hundred years, after that period they become brittle, crumble and are reduced to powder at the slightest touch or disturbance. Hence no ancient palm leaves can be available now. Palm leaves are of two kinds – the palmyrah and the talipot palm. The second variety is more pliable, longer and broader, but with the passing of time, it becomes black and the writing thereon soon becomes indecipherable. The ordinary palmyrah though stiffer does not get black, and so it was usually preferred. Except a few manuscripts, almost all are in palm leaf. When the old manuscripts became no longer fit for handling, scholars had new ones made. Hence we can have manuscripts written only during the last five hundred years and less. These naturally would give us only the script current at the time of their writing and are no guide to the original script.

THE EARLY PERIOD

In the days of Asoka, a script called the brāhmi was employed for writing, throughout India. Inscriptions in the Tamil country date back to the 3rd century B. C. The same brāhmi letters, with some additional letters like la, la, ra, na (ழ, ள, ட, ள) peculiar to the Tamil language, are used in these inscriptions. These are found mostly associated with jain rock-beds in natural caverns. A jaina text, assigned to the 1st century B. C., calls this script Damili, that is, 'of the Tamil country'.

This script underwent changes and evolved into the modern characters, through the centuries.

Two different scripts were employed in later times for writing the Tamil language. They are popularly called the Tamil and the vatteluttu scripts. These two begin to branch off from the parent damili, towards the end of 2nd century A. D. and were fully formed by the 5th century.

The Tamil script employed throughout the length and breadth of the Tamil country underwent a continuous evolution, and reached the present form towards the end of 17th century.

Vatteluttu, a form of circular script, was widely used in the Pāṇḍimandalam region, the southern part of Tamiḷnad. It was thought that this script originated and evolved only in Pāṇḍināḍu, that is, the southern part of Tamiḷnad. But recent discoveries and researches have proved that this script was prevalent all over the Tamiḷnad, except the Chōḷa region. Inscriptions found on hero-stones, particularly in the northern districts, are mostly in this script, which indicate the popularity of this script among the masses. However, this ceased to be an effective script for writing in the northern districts by the end of 8th century, but was continued vigorously in the Pāṇḍiya region. The Pāṇḍiyas seem to have had a preference for this, for some of their royal charters on copper plates are found in this script. For reasons inexplicable, the Chōḷa country never had any fancy for this script, and it is not found anywhere in that region.

THE CHOLA PERIOD

When the Chōḷas rose to be an imperial power in the 10th century and brought the entire Tamiḷ country under their banner, they favoured the Tamiḷ script. The vatteluttu lingered on in the Pāṇḍiya region for another three centuries, before disappearing completely from the scene. The west coast, which had a natural geographical isolation, continued with the vatteluttu till very late. It took there another form as kōleluttu and ultimately went out of use. For writing Sanskrit and Prakrit works, a script now being called the grantha was employed. It is likely that the name Drāviḍi, applied to a script in the Buddhist text Lalitavistāra, refers to this form of writing. Grantha, which bears close resemblance to early Kannada and Telugu scripts in the formative stages, was the main script employed throughout Tamiḻnad for Prakṛit and Sanskrit writings. It was the most popular and influential script for over 1600 years. Till a decade ago, all the Sanskrit books published in Tamiḻnad were in this script, even today the aged scholars could read only this script.

The nāgarī script was also used sparsely in Tamiḻnad from the 8th century. The Pallavas and the Āy chieftains of Vēnādu have made use of this script. The Chōḷas also did use this script on some of their coins. The Vijayanagar emperors employed it on some of their royal charters. The nāgarī of the Vijayanagar period was called the nandī-nāgarī.

There was a gradual improvement of the writing under the Chōḷas. The most handsome letters have been shaped in the days of Rajaraja I. The script began to undergo a change after him and, by the period of the Vijayanagar empire, it had settled into a permanent form, which has come down to the present day and has also been universally adopted all over the Tamiḻnad, as can be seen in the manuscript books available from the different areas.

Some of the grammarians like Tolkāppiyar, Divākara, Yāpparunkalam commentator and Mayilāināthar have devoted some thought to the subject of script, it is beyond the scope of our purpose here, to discuss their thoughts.

PRINTING

The Tamil script took on its present, more or less permanent, shape only when Tamil books began to be printed, i.e., by the beginning of the 18th century. The first printing closely followed the manuscript writing found on the cadjan leaf books. It differed considerably from the writing of today. It did not use separate symbols for long \bar{e} and the long \bar{o} (ஏ, ஒ, ெ-ஓ). It did not use the dot to denote a pure consonant as distinguished from the consonant plus the vowel a ; e.g., k and ka (க, க்) were written alike. It did not distinguish between the symbol for a long sound such as \bar{a} , \bar{o} and the letter ra (கா, கொ, கோ, ர) it did not begin to use the left downward elongation on the letter ra (ர) now found in print. The symbol of la (ள) now written over the horizontal line of short u (உ) to denote that it is long \bar{u} (஁) in modern print, was then printed after u as a separate letter (உள). In all the above cases, — \bar{e} , \bar{o} (vowels and consonants), ra and \bar{u} and pure consonant sounds (without a), — only the reader familiar with manuscript reading could read the printed book correctly and fluently. Thus the print of those days was a close imitation of the manuscript writing of the period. Paper manuscripts of the period also may be seen to be exactly like the cadjan leaf writing.

The symbol for la (ள) in the first printing was itself a little confused when compared with the modern symbol. The letter now begins in a small circlet from the left, goes clockwise, has a downward stroke, goes up then and ends with another downward stroke. In the first printing, the second downward stroke was further drawn down, inwards, as we have in \bar{e} and ra (ஏ, ர) in modern writing and print. In time, this downward projection was abandoned.

Again the symbol ai (ஐ) for consonants. Most letters take on a separate symbol as a prefix (஁); the na, na (the nasal which is the softener for the hard medial), la and la (னா, னா, லா, லா) are exceptions today in print; in these cases a superimposed circlet is joined to the small curl which begins each letter. This is a great nuisance in typing, as every one knows. It may be interesting to know that there was a different earlier form of this symbol. In respect of the four letters mentioned here, a symbol exactly like va (வ) was prefixed and the open arm of the letter va was joined to the initial curl of the letter to make the vowel ai combination of that consonant. This form was current even during the first quarter of this century, when it was dropped, giving place to the present symbol. Hence no tear need be shed if this separate symbol in regard to the four consonants only is dropped and a uniform separate prefixed ai symbol (வை) is adopted for all the consonants.

The following symbols again are illogical and require to be changed, π the long of இ, many consonants with u and \bar{u} – such as ku and $k\bar{u}$ (கு, கூ); many consonants with ஆ, ஒ, ஓ – such as ஞா, ஞா, ஞா, ஞா etc, and some similar others.

A second stage of the printing was the superimposition of a dot on e and o short, to show that the sound is short, on the consonant-vowel a combinations to indicate that they are only consonants. The third stage of course is the present print where the symbol for letters \bar{e} and ra are just projected downward a little to the left, the symbols in consonants for \bar{e} and \bar{o} are given an additional loop at the top and bottom respectively (ஃ) and the symbol la is imposed over the horizontal line in the symbol for u to make it \bar{u} .

The shape of the letters has not been uniform even in all modern printing types. The vagaries of the type-caster in the type foundries have given rise to considerable change and mutilation even in the accepted shape of the letters, as an instance may be mentioned the old 10 point small pica antique types. The downward curve of the letters ψ and ϕ is not brought to the level of the top of the letter here but is simply ended below the base of the letter, in the letter Ω, the arc enveloping the whole letter does not cut through the two loops at the bottom but merely makes a round.

We may not be certain that the last word on the subject has been said. As pointed out in the opening lines of this section, a reform necessitated by space and speed is certain to come³ and we may not be sure that our grand children's children will be studying the same script that we studied.

Notes

1. The vatteluttu is so called because it was always in the shape of curves (vattam - circle, curves) Kanneluttu mentioned in the Silappadhikaram may be considered to be this vatteluttu
2. The city of Pataliputra was then known as Nagara (the city) and the script that was largely in use there was the nagari. This was naturally glorified later as deva-nagari
3. When we start having an expert committee for standardising a rational form for the letters, there is disagreement and confusion. But if some imaginative and enterprising printer adopts the innovation and alterations without any, they will automatically become the standard forms in the course of quarter of a century

INSCRIPTIONS

THEIR NATURE

The most important source for determining the history of South India, more particularly of the Tamil nad, is the inscriptional evidence. The Pāndiyas, the Chōlas and the Pallavas had recorded their gifts to temples and to individuals mostly in their inscriptional records on the outer walls of the inner shrines of most of the old granite temples, and occasionally on copper plate grants also. A few of these plates have been discovered and their records published. But most of them had been destroyed, as the plates were melted for their copper value by ignorant people who could not know the historical and cultural value of the plate records. A large part of the temple inscriptions are still available but quite a large part had also been destroyed, when well-intentioned people, who had of course devotion but no knowledge of the cultural and historical value of the inscriptions, started the work of temple renovation during the end of the last century and the first quarter of this century. When rebuilding, the large stones containing inscriptional records were chiselled or dismantled and displaced in such a manner that the records could not be read again. The Archaeological department at the Centre had however taken copies of many of such records before dismantling, some they have published, but many more yet remain unpublished.

The persons who originally invented epigraphy seem to have been very thoughtful people. There is nowhere any brick inscription when even stone inscriptions crack up and crumble into powder, through the action of the atmosphere, the fate of any brick inscription can easily be imagined. Nor has any intrinsically costly material been used anywhere. marble has not been used, only granite stones have been put to the largest use. Similarly copper; iron will rust in no time and so it was never used. Silver and gold had intrinsic value as precious metals. So although there was plenty of these metals in the past, they were never used for records of grants, because the plates would come to be used for their metal value and records of grants would cease to exist.

Tamil inscriptions are found not only in the Tamilnad but also in the adjoining Telugu, Kannada and Malayalam speaking areas bordering on Tamilnad (Andhra pradesh, Mysore and Kerala states), over which the Tamil ruling dynasties held sway at various periods, they are also found in their overseas territories such as Ceylon and Malaysia.

A number of rock inscriptions are found around Madurai and they date from the 3rd century B C to the 2nd century A D. They record the fashioning of a rock with a polished surface within a cave to serve as a sort of rockbed to the Jain monks by merchants of the period; a pillow in situ had also been provided in rock. A groove had also been arranged for the soaking rain water to collect and flow out. Pāndiyan Nedunceliyan is mentioned in one such inscription. Another mentions Kadumko, probably Pālai-pādiya-perum Kadumkō of the sangham period¹. Thus they are all important in the reconstruction of the history of the period. An inscription of the period² mentions some musical instruments; it is probably the earliest inscription on a musical subject

Another type of inscriptions is that which has come to be known now as the hero-stone. Tolkāppiyar³ says that a stone was placed in memory of a soldier who fell in battle, his name and achievements were inscribed on it and worship was offered to it by the grateful community for whose sake he gave up his life. This has come to be known as the hero-stone. This is celebrated in *Aha nānūru*⁴ and *Pura nānūru*⁵. Sēramān perumāl⁶ goes out of the way to mention it, in one of his poems in the Eleventh Book of the Saiva Canon.

The discovery of many hero-stones recently in several places⁷ has opened up a new area of research in this field. These stones mostly deal with warriors who fell fighting in battle or for some other similar cause. Many aspects of the concepts dealt with in the Purapporul part of Tamil grammar⁸ find exemplified in these inscriptions. The hero-stones have probably given rise to the later worship of heroes as minor deities, in various parts of the country. We see in the hero-stone inscriptions the common man also (not the patron or chief, nor the accomplished hero) being made the subject of praise and record.

The Chōlas are responsible for switching over the emphasis in inscriptions from Sanskrit and Prakrit to Tamil. All their inscriptions are indeed monuments to the Tamil language, its poetry and its culture. We find elegant phrases taken from the Śaiva canon and given to the Sivācāryas and women dancers⁹ in the temple

THEIR FORM AND CONTENT

The inscriptions usually have a first part which sings of the glory of the ruling monarch, this part is always in verse, the second part deals with the specific grants recorded in that particular inscription. Vijayālaya, the founder of the Chōla dynasty at Tanjāvūr in the ninth century, had some hero-stone inscriptions, no inscriptional grants. The grand form of the inscriptions started with Rājarāja I.¹⁰ All Chōla inscriptions opened with the phrase svasti-śri (let there be peace and happiness)

The Tamil preface, the first part of the inscription, is called meik-kīrtti, later grammatical books lay down rules for writing the meik-kīrtti. It is often in the āsiriyam metre and also in the kalippā metre. It started with a few lines, but as the empire expanded, and as the conquests of the kings grew and their empires expanded, the meik-kīrtti also swelled in size and we have meik-kīrtti running to 100 lines and more. This ends in the following form 'in the regnal year of King reigning from his throne with his queen (The introduction of the queen into the inscriptions starts with Vīrarājendra¹¹) Then follows particulars of the grant, and lastly, the officer of state under whose orders the grant was recorded, the names of the witnesses to the record, the name of the person who actually transferred it to stone and finally something on the following lines: Don't forget virtue May Mahēśvara help us.'

The first part is often of good verse, composed in an assonant style, with rhyme and alliteration. Generally it gives an account of some kings, their battles, the places of battle, the capital cities, the princes who were defeated, the extent of annexation made, the resulting good to the country, and similar facts. This has been the source for the reconstruction of the political history of the Chōla dynasty.

The second part gives details of grants - the temple to which the grant is made, the political divisions of the country corresponding to the modern province, district, taluk etc., names of deities, extent of land, boundaries, purposes for which given, amount of annual income expected in kind and converted into gold, service for which intended, number of persons, wage rates, schedule of articles used and their quantities, food and other such details, including the penalty for non-performance of service.

THEIR VALUE

It is evident that the temples served as a sort of public record office which preserved documents affecting the community for a considerable length of time. Temple walls are open to public view and can be known by all. A document recorded there does not perish, as palm leaves are likely to perish, in a few centuries. No one can do away with it or alter it.

We get here a glimpse of the weights and measures in use then, and their names, land measurements, rates of wages for the different services, names of vessels, jewels, lands, places, dresses, and a host of others, in fact we get here a new vocabulary as it were, unheard of in modern days and even in other recorded literature. We hear for the first time in Indian history the practice of village autonomy, an administration of the village by the village elders, we get an insight into the political divisions of the kingdom and their administration, the order of inheritance of the crown, the king's cabinet, the manner of taxation and public revenue, the administration of justice, franchise, election, village assemblies, maintenance of irrigation sources, land survey, classification of lands, social customs, trade, embassies, coinage, education, medicine, handicrafts, methods of worship, temple orchestra, food and nutrition, sanitation and hygiene, and similar activities of public life. This opens up before us a new world of words and their usage, which is very valuable in linguistic research.

The Chōḷa history for a period of five centuries from the ninth to the thirteenth has been completely reconstructed from these records and this fully agrees with the available literary evidences of such history. The Pāṇḍiya and the Pallava history has been reconstructed in part. Pāṇḍiya inscriptional records are available from the eighth century, we know about the Kaḷabhra interregnum only from the Vēlvikkudī grant of the period ¹² When the Muslims invaded Madurai, the Pāṇḍiyas fled the city and settled themselves at Tenkāśī, further south. Inscriptions of the Tenkāśī Pāṇḍiyas are available till the sixteenth century ¹³ Similarly Pallava inscriptions are also available from the seventh, their earliest inscriptions were in prakrit upto the fourth century; then inscriptions in Sanskrit upto the sixth century, lastly we have their grantha-Tamīl grants from the seventh century. The Pallavās had been patrons of Sanskrit learning and their inscriptions had a considerable amount of Sanskrit in them.

LITERATURE

The inscriptions throw light on the life and work of about a hundred poets and men of letters. They have made indeed a significant contribution to literature also. The hymns sung by Sambandha, collected into the first threebooks of the Saiva canon are 383 padikams. A padikam not collected into the canon, on Tiru-Vidaivāy,¹⁴ a shrine in Tanjavur district, has been made available from the inscriptions. A complete poem, Tiru - Sirāmalaiantādi,¹⁵ of 104 verses, by Nārāyanan son of Maniyan in praise of Lord Śiva of that place, is found inscribed on the temple walls. These are rare finds of long and complete poems. Other valuable finds include the verses on Kōpperum-Singa, Kārīgai-kulattūr, the Paṭṭinapp-pālai mandapam and the Tenkāśi Pāndiyas.

An inscription of Kōpperum-Singa (13th c.)¹⁶ says that he hoisted his banner on the hill of Nanna celebrated in the poem Kadām, the reference is to the the Malaipadukadām, the last poem of the Pattup-pāṭṭu. The sangham poet Kapilar is mentioned in an inscription of Rājarāja I,¹⁷ 'he arranged for the wedding of the daughters of Pārī who had been sheltered by him and then gave up his life.' A Pāndiya inscription refers to the sixteen pillared hall,¹⁸ where the poem Paṭṭinappālai was released. We learn that the Bhāratam was translated into Tamil under Kulōttunga III.¹⁹

Many incidents which are generally considered to be mere legend are found recorded in inscriptions. Meypporul nāyanār not only gave up his life for the cause of Śiva's emblem, but also took special pains to ensure that the foe who killed him did not come to harm, this fact is recorded on the pedestal of his image as 'the lord of Milādu who said, Datta, this is our friend', the point of interest here is that this inscription is earlier²⁰ than Sēkkilār, who has sung about this incident in his Periya Purāṇam. We learn that one street in Tīru Arur was called 'the street which gave out the fragrance of the feet of the Lord', in memory of the visit of the Lord of Tīru Arur at dead of night to the house of Paravaḷ as the messenger of love from Sundara.

An inscription of the Vijayanagara rulers (A. D. 1443) records that Śiva enshrined in Tīru Nelvāyil-Aratturāḷ was known as 'He who gave a pearl palanquin', celebrating an incident narrated in the story of Tīru Jñāna Sambandha in the same purāṇam. There are scores of similar instances.

Cīdambaram and Tīru Adhikāḷ temple inscriptions contain 61 venbas giving an account of the contribution made by Naralōkavīraṇ Kālingarāyan to the two temples²¹. Tīruvannāmalāḷ temple inscriptions give us 22 verses singing the glory of Magadaḷp-perūmāl.²² Similar instances are many.

The references to literary figures and poems and phrases and expressions, taken from literature such as the Saiva Canon, have immense historical value, in helping us to determine the period of the writers and their writing. Inscriptions are besides a form of real prose, contemporary Tamil, as it was spoken and written down in public records. We have thousands of such temple records, they have not yet been fully explored from the literary and the linguistic points of view. A devoted study of the records will amply reward patient scholars and will help them to take further strides in the march of linguistic and literary development

Notes and References

- 1 Vide Kalvettiyal, R Nagasami and others Nedunceliyan page 49, Kadumko - page 67
- 2 Ibid page 75
- 3 Tolkappiyam, Poruladhikaram 63, lines 19-20
4. Aha nanuru 131, also Malai padukadam lines 388-9, Kural 771
5. Pura nanuru verses 221, 223, 260-1 and many others.
6. Tiru Arur mummanikkovai, verse 16 lines 1-2
- 7 Vide Sengam nadu karkal R Nagasami, 1972
- 8 Purapporul venba malai 175, 247-253
9. Cf Tarunendu sekharā bhattan, Edutta padam, Malalai cilambu, Maruda manikkam etc
10. Cholar caritram Sadasiva Pandarattar, part I 1958, page 100
11. Ibid page 282, Cf Virarajendra's meykkirtti beginning 'virame tunaiyakavum'
- 12 Peruntohai, M Raghava Aiyangar 1936, verse 889
- 13 Ibid verses 942-52, and others
- 14 Tiruvadaivayp-padikam, Sambandhar Devaram, Samajam edition 1937, page 639.
- 15 Tiri-Siramalai antadi edited by M Raghava Aiyangar 1953.

- 16 Inscription of the period of Kopperum-singan in the Tīru Annamalai temple, S I I, vol VIII, pages 39-41.
- 17 Inscription of the period of Rajaraja I from Tirukkovalur, page 266 of Cholar caritram I quoted
- 18 Inscription from Tīru Vellarai temple, verse beginning 'veriyar talavattodai' Sundaia Pandiyan 1219 A D.
- 19 MER 482 of 1905
- 20 'Datta namare kan enra miladudaiyar' - an inscription of the period of Rajaraja I S I I, vol II, No 40
- 21 Peruntohar verses 1065-94, 1095-1119
- 22 Ibid 1158-1179

In addition the following books may be studied with profit :
Sasana Tamil kavī caritam, M Raghava Aiyangar 1937; Sasana seyyul manjarī, Mayilai-Sini Venkatasami 1959, and Kalvettīyal, R Nagasami and others 1972

THE MODERN PERIOD

Under this heading we shall speak a few words about the achievements and the trends of the twentieth century. We are much too much involved in the period to make an objective estimate of its trends. The forces which make for literary output during this period are many. The vast development of printing and journalism, the unprecedented and extensive development of literacy, the after-effects of two global wars and the psycho-social pressure resulting therefrom, the impact of the two great powers, the United States of America and Russia on all aspects of Indian life and thought, and most important, the struggle for independence, the Gandhian era and its final culmination in the achievement of Indian independence – all these factors have shaped writing in Tamilnad, as in the rest of India. The advances in printing have made vast strides in prose possible, and journalism has given birth to a large crop of writers of varying worth. Journalism necessarily means the filling up of so many pages daily, weekly and monthly, and pen-pushing has become an unavoidable necessity. English education has made the West the model for this purpose. This model is easy and ready-made, to evolve a model out of one's own cultural heritage is very difficult, and impossible for most.

BHARATI

The one poet who forged a link between the past and the present and between the present and the future, who excelled in prose as well as in poetry, and who exploited journalism to a higher literary purpose with considerable success, was Subrahmanya Bhārati. The rise of this genius synchronised with the freedom fight, and in him we have perhaps the greatest national poet for all time. The passing of years will only heighten the value of his poetry, even after nationalism dies, a major portion of his poetry will live as a cherished literary legacy of the Tamils. He was a prolific writer, poetry, prose, short story, political criticism, social reform, devotional writing, and philosophical exposition flowed from his pen freely. In the struggle against poverty and against the oppression of the foreign yoke, he could not last long, he died young, at the close of the first world war, long before freedom was won. Much of his writing was prophetic¹ and far ahead of his times. Writers like him are not produced every other day. He had many imitators in his own day, but they were just versifiers and no more, a versifier can certainly produce a few good verses in a life time, that does not make him a poet. Desikavīṇayakam Pillai had occasional flashes of good poetry but he was a far cry from Bhārati. His importance lies in the fact that keeping his poetry firmly rooted in Tamil culture, he allowed the wind from the West to blow over its blooms.

THE PAST

English education has produced Manōnmanīyam,² a drama on the western model. It is good and is original as far as it goes, because there was no literary form of the drama before it.

Sūryanārāyana Śāstri, a great Tamil enthusiast, lived in the last quarter of the 19th century, he died very young. Being English educated, he felt the need for original writing in Tamil on the western model and so made many attempts to produce literature in several fields. He wrote dramas in verse, essays and also poetry, besides literary criticism. He was responsible for two trends in Tamil writing. One was an imitation of English writing. He wrote many 'sonnets' in Tamil composed in fourteen lines on various natural objects, which were just poor verse. He forgot that each language had its own emotional, rhythmic and poetic form and a blind and mechanical imitation of the verse form in another language was not conducive to the production of poetry in one's own language. Again, he lived in an age when the struggle for freedom was afoot. This had its reaction in the literary sphere also. Out of a misguided enthusiasm for Tamil, he was responsible for fanning the anti-Sanskrit movement, he had changed his name from Sūryanārāyana Śāstri to Parīti-māl-Kalaijñar which is a Tamil rendering of the Sanskrit words. He was a brahmin himself and he was English educated, naturally his enthusiasm for pure Tamil evoked great admiration. But the result was more harm than good.

Poetry and music to be great must be inspired. Inspiration never comes through agitation. The Tamil isai movement from the point of view of common sense is most correct. It has produced quite a large volume of musical composition. But rarely do we find in all these compositions a single piece of the emotional standard of Muttu Tāndavar or Gopālakṛiṣṇa Bhārati.

Journalistic writing had brought to the fore many talented writers like Kālyanasundara Mudaliyar and Kalki (R. Krishnamurti). Their writing released the Tamil muse from her shackles and gave her a fresh freedom of movement, power and joy. This occurred during the years around 1930 when the written word was employed with power to carry to the masses the message of the freedom fight. The short story was made popular in the whole of India by Tagore, and originated by Bhārati and V V S Aiyar in Tamilnad, it caught on, and today a writer here means a short story writer. Persons eminent in their own right such as Rajaji and Dr. Swaminatha Aiyar could not resist exploiting this medium.

The great older writers never stopped to consider whether the word they used was of Sanskrit origin or of Tamil origin. It was always a struggle for expression and an earnest desire to put across one's own innermost thoughts. They handled words as they occurred and never cared to stop and choose.

T K C was the greatest exponent of literary taste and poetic appreciation. He had a keen ear for poetry and those who had the good fortune to come under his influence, had the greatest time of their lives. Like the famous Dr. Johnson of English literature, and Minaksisundaram Pillai, Swaminatha Aiyar's guru of the 19th century, he was a giant among stalwarts and he always radiated love and culture, and an emotional and creative appreciation of all art and all life, literature and poetry were only part of his greater personality. Many under his influence have flowered into good and artistic writers.

The tradition of accurate textual scholarship was started by Swaminatha Aiyar, the torch was held aloft by Vaidyanatha Pillai after him, but such scholarship has since become scarce.

The prose-poem (or free verse), an imitation of similar writing in English, was the fashion a decade ago. It was merely a cloak to cover dearth of ideas, absence of form, ignorance of language and an unwillingness to discipline oneself.

The new writers often speak of appealing to the common man as if it were the touchstone by which all creative writing shall be judged. The arbiter of Literature and Art is, not the common man, but the cultured man. All poets sing only for the cultivated mind, a mind of culture, not necessarily the educated or the learned. An unlettered man may be a man of culture, while one highly educated may be blissfully innocent of any culture. We can only say that among the really cultured, caste or class is no bar to a complete understanding and appreciation of art and letters. People who had known T. K. C. in their lives would have noticed that his exposition of poetry equally appealed to the highly learned and to the untutored, but not to the pedant, the bigot, and the highly sophisticated academician.

THE PRESENT

Modern writing in general claims to be realistic—a feature copied from foreign writing. Indian art and writing have always had an element of idealism in them. If realism is the utter absence of idealism, it would degenerate into vulgarity. What may appear to be realistic to the foreign eye may not appear so to the Indian eye but may appear coarse and vulgar. Vulgarity cannot become art. It had always been looked down upon by eminent writers through the centuries. Every nation and every language has its own way of expressing things, the Tamil language has a form of expressing every life experience in its own way, which we call a refined way. A certain degree of coarseness had marked some earlier Tamil poetry no doubt because of the poet's cheap desire to pander to the tastes of the petty uncultured chiefs of the 18-19th centuries. But this was against the general vein of poetic composition in the Tamil language.

Popular art or art for the masses need not necessarily mean vulgarity. It may mean simplicity, perhaps over-simplification, but certainly not coarseness. 'Kāyamē idu poyyadā-kārradantta payada' (this body is unreal, it is only an inflated bag) - a song of the popular street beggar, is certainly over-simple, but it is not vulgar or coarse.

The modern days witness a regimentation of all thought and writing. The film, the radio, the journals and the cheap foreign books have all become the disseminators of bad taste and coarseness. Some one remarked that India is the paradise of hippidom; the truth of this statement will be borne out by a superficial glance at the best-selling weekly and monthly journals in Tamilnad. Such an atmosphere is against the spirit of all that the Tamilian has held dear and valuable through the ages, against all that Tiruvalluvar and Ilango in the distant past and Bhārati in the recent present stood for.

Vulgarity attracts the 'common man' and it is his vote which seals the fate of the political party. Hence to pander to low taste, coarseness and vulgarity would appear to be the aim now of any human activity on the popular front. One who does not tow the party line in such matters is pushed out, and once pushed out, there is no coming back. And besides, every one has to live. So by any means he manages to keep himself in the front line of affairs. Those who call themselves academicians and writers have blindly imbibed this trend and have given us large quantities of such writing. We need not call it literature. This is not to say that no great literature has been produced in the present age. It is undeniable that no one of the modern writers comes anywhere near Subrahmanya Bharati. Perhaps some may have produced good literature in fields other than poetry. But it is well nigh impossible to pick out literature from the maze of the material which is being reeled off in an ever increasing torrent from the press.

The years coming immediately after the second world war witnessed a complete change in all spheres of human activity in our country. In the sphere of literary production, the change was towards a blind imitation of all that was American or Russian. Old moorings had violently snapped Art is a reflection of the personality of man, blooming from his inner most being, it is rarely achieved through imitation, however great the original and however laudable the attempt But Art and Literature cannot thrive upon a total repudiation of the past All growth in art or literature should have its roots in the past; its branches may reach out any where, to the four corners of the globe, but all the nourishment therefor has to be taken mostly from the roots

A new life and a new vigour is discernible among a section of the younger generation of the Tamil writers and academic scholars, they seek to appraise the past with a view to find a key to the eternal values held sacred by the Tamilian. This augurs well for the future of the Tamil language and its literature.

An objective appraisal of contemporary writing can be best made by posterity, but it is good and desirable that periodically we critically review the past and the present of our literature and set the poets and the poems in a new order.

Notes and References

- 1 Vide his tributes to Mahatma Gandhi and Maha mahopadhyaya Swaminatha Aiyar, while they were alive, and long before their greatness had any wide acclaim
- 2 Manonmaniyam edited by Vairapuri Pillai 1930
- 3 The editions issued by the Oriental Manuscripts Library in Madras (vide their Sundara pandiyam) and by the Sarasvati Mahal Library of Tanjavur (vide their volume containing three Pillai-Tamil poems and their Bharatam-Mayindam) bear witness to this,

APPENDICES

NOTES

1 MUTTOLLAYIRAM

There have been quite a number of major poems, which are frequently quoted by the classical commentators with great reverence but are lost to us. They are Sirattakam on love themes, Perum porul vilakkam on puram themes, Muttollayiram (on both aham and puram themes), Asiriyamalai (in the asiriyappa metre on ethical themes), and Tagadur yattirai (probably a connected narrative in venba and asiriyappa, dealing with the raid of the three Tamil monarchs on the city of Adhikan and his destruction). Except the last, the others are all isolated verses, the first three are in the venba metre. The writers refer to these books along with the 18 Kilk-kanakku. We get quite a large volume of the verses from these books cited in the various commentaries.

These books may be placed in the 7th and the 8th centuries A. D. A few words may be said here about Muttollayiram. It might probably have been a poem of 900 verses (tollayiram - 900) sung on the three ruling princes of Tamilnad. It is a unique classic, in the tradition of the sangham age, but more elastic and more lyrical. About 110 verses from the poem are now available and they make us feel that the Tamil language is all the poorer for the loss of the whole poem. Each of the verses available is supremely dramatic, enacting a scene on the theme chosen, be it love or war, with two or more characters. The language, though simple, is neither archaic nor very modern and is fully charged with emotion.

The composition will for ever be an enigma to the historian. During the period when the author wrote the poem, there was only the Pandiya ruler ruling from Madurai. There was no Chola ruler of any importance and nothing is known about the Sera ruler of the period. The question how the author chose to sing on the three rulers remains unanswered.

2 PANCA MARAPU

In a world of newly emerging hypercriticism which seeks to denigrate most things ancient in Tamil literature with disbelief and the charge of exaggeration and legendry, it is heartening to find that a grammatical manual on music and dance quoted by Adiyarkku nallar the commentator of Silappadhikaram has now been brought to light and published, after this volume went to the press Panca marapu (see page 47 of this book) is one of the five manuals quoted by Nallar as the authority for his commentary. All of them appear to have passed into oblivion, however, this book Panca marapu, by some accidental stroke of good fortune, seems to have been preserved by V R Deivasikhamani goundar. Its first part dealing with two of its five sections has been published with an ancient gloss. 124 venbas find place in this part out of a total of 240. Though the sangham age and earlier periods are claimed as the date for this manual, it can be seen that it was composed by the end of the 9th century. The publication should silence the sceptics and would assure that most of the literature, claimed to be lost by the various commentators, did in fact really exist.

3 AHAM and PURAM (Vide page 31)

A note on this subject should have gone into the text of this book as one of the early sections. In its place the following note is here appended. Poetry in the sangham age falls into the two broad classifications aham and puram. Aham means inside and puram outside, these signify love poetry and other poetry. Other poetry has been elaborately dealt with as war poetry and chiefly as everything else besides love. This classification does not appear to exist in other literatures. Tamilnad of two thousand years ago seems to have been ruled by the three royal houses Sera, Chola and Pandiya, besides a few petty chiefs. Population was sparse, people had the wherewithal to live a life of ease and comfort. Music and dance there was in plenty, and food and drink. The ruling houses and the chiefs often fought with one another. Poets and bards were mediators and counsellors. Men lived a happy life, engaging themselves in love at home and outside, taking part in the wars.

of their chiefs. In this atmosphere was born the tradition of the aham poetry and the puram poetry. A high sense of patriotism and honour in war and of chivalry in domestic life pervaded the culture of the people. These two aspects were gradually evolved into an artistic literary convention.

As has been pointed out elsewhere, the major part of the sangham poetry deals with the aham or love themes and this was again related to the five physiographical regions. The life of the lovers is traced through various experiences which are related to the regions and are called tinaṭi, behaviour and experience. They meet in the verdant and luxuriant forest where their first passion blooms into love; this is kuringi. The clandestine love is naturally followed by the pangs of separation palai (desert). Then ensues a period of patient waiting in the home, mullai. An agonised waiting follows, which is called neidal. Lastly quiet domestic felicity resulting through mature love, of course with its attendant infidelity (which was probably a part of the life of the period), and sulking, called marutam. Not only the land, but the season and the time of the day have been set apart for each tinaṭi. Other distinctive features, comprising of the patron deity, the class of people, animals, the flora and the fauna, the food, music and the avocation of the people, constitute another section of the convention. The sentiments related to the union, the separation, the patient waiting, the agonised waiting, and the quiet life and its sulking form the third section of this convention.

The entire love poetry is in the nature of little dramatic episodes or monologues. Convention lays down the actors, the poet never says anything, only the characters speak. Here all characters are in the abstract, no one could be specified by his or her proper name, whereupon it would cease to be love poetry and become puram poetry.

The other section puram dealt mostly with tribal wars. There is also here definite poetic convention laying down seven divisions in the war poetry, all of them named after flowers. Vetṭi is the capturing of the enemy's herds of cows, karantai is their rescue, vanjī is the advance on the enemy, and kancī is the defence against that advance, nocci is the defence of a fort, and ulīnai is its siege, tumbai is the battle, and lastly vahai is the victory. Such wars bring home to the leaders the transcient nature of all life and kancī the next stage defines this, padan the last division is the praise of the victor and eventually of all patrons. Tolkappiyam includes kancī and nocci in vanjī and ulīnai and gives only a total of seven divisions. All poetry which is not on a love theme is brought into these puram divisions. Poetry which is of the general nature of a praise of the patron is brought under padan.

THE SCHEME OF TRANSLITERATION

Tamil words are usually rendered here into English as they are pronounced by normal educated people, and not as they are spelt in the Tamil alphabet. The transliteration has been made in accordance with the Sanskrit spelling in respect of Tamil words of well known Sanskrit origin.

Some terms familiar to Tamilians like Chola have been written only in this spelling without changing Ch into C as strict transliteration would require, the term Tamil (and Tamiṇad) and its cognates have been spelt only as Tamil instead of Tamiḷ (and Tamiḷ nāḍu), so also swami, these are a concession to familiar spelling in the land.

The r ending as an honorific suffix in many personal names such as Sambandhar and Sundarar has been omitted but retained in a few others like Appar and Kambar. The spelling Sera has been preferred to Cera (or Chera). The two words, names of places Vanṇi and Kanci (வஞ்சி, காஞ்சி), though they may appear to sound alike, are written differently as given here, Kanci takes on a harder sound at the end because probably of its association with the hard sound in another form Kacci.

Excepting the variations pointed out here, the generally accepted pattern of diacritical marking has been adopted. Diacritical marks have been adopted only in the text, they have not been adopted in the footnotes or in the index etc. for obvious handicaps in the printing press.

The scheme of transliteration is explained below.

VOWELS

அ	-	a
ஆ	-	ā
இ	-	i
ஈ	-	ī
உ	-	u
ஊ	-	ū
எ	-	e
ஏ	-	ē
ஐ	-	ai
ஒ	-	o
ஓ	-	ō
ஔ	-	ou

CONSONANTS

க	-	k	ல்	-	l
ங்	-	n	வ்	-	v
ச	-	c	ழ	-	l
ஞ	-	ñ	ள	-	l
ட்	-	t	ற	-	r
ண	-	n	ன	-	n
த்	-	t	ஜ	-	j
ந்	-	n	ஸ	-	s
ப	-	p	ஷ	-	s
ம	-	m	ஸ	-	s
ய	-	y	க்ஷ	-	ks
ர	-	r	ஹ	-	h

n before k and g takes the corresponding guttural nasal sound - ங and so no separate symbol has been adopted here for ங, ங cannot occur at the beginning a word. As there is now no difference in the pronunciation of ங and ண by the Tamilians, separate symbols are not used, only ங can occur at the beginning of a word and never ண.

g, d, b - denote the soft guttural, dental and labial respectively; ḡ - the soft cerebral, these four soft sounds have no symbols in Tamil.

h after a consonant, takes the corresponding aspirated consonant sound as in kh, gh, ch, th, dh, ph and bh (occurring only in Sanskrit words).

Notes

1. No attempt is made here to indicate the pronunciation of the Tamil letters, it is presumed the reader knows it. Only an attempt to explain the appropriate English symbol is made here.
2. The manuscript of this book, originally prepared for the press without diacritical marks, was later revised, incorporating diacritical marks. In doing so, there could have occurred some inconsistencies in spelling for which I crave the indulgence of the reader.

GLOSSARY

Abhinaya	—	Indication of sentiment by gesture in a dance
acharya	—	spiritual preceptor
adhikaram	—	section
advaita	—	non-duality or monism, a school of philosophy
advaitin	—	follower of the advaita school of philosophy
agama	—	Sanskrit Saiva scripture
aham	—	love theme
ahapporul	—	poetics dealing with the love theme aharadi	—	dictionary, alphabetical arrangement
ahaval	—	asiriyam, a type of metre antinai	—	the five types of love themes or behaviour according to the five regions of land
alankara	—	rhetoric
alvar	—	a Vaishnava saint
ammai	—	mother
ammanai	—	ballad song
ani	—	rhetoric
antadi	—	a poem of several verses where the end word of the first occurs as the first word of the next aram	—	virtue, righteousness, general ethics
artha	—	wealth
asiriyam	—	a type of ancient metre, corresponding to the blank verse in English atma	—	soul.
avatara	—	incarnation.
ayar	—	cowherd
ayiram	—	one thousand
Bhagavan	—	God
bhagavata	—	a devotee of Vishnu.
bhakta	—	devotee
bhakti	—	devotion to a personal God
bhashya	—	commentary on a religious treatise.
Cadjan	—	palm leaf manuscript.
chakravartti	—	emperor.
chandam	—	rhythmic, musical flow of verse with a regular beat charya	— religious service.

citrak-kavi	— variety of difficult verse.
Darsan	— holy vision.
desika	— preceptor.
dharma	— righteousness, duty.
dvaita	— dualism.
gita	— song
gopi	— an ayar girl, playmate of child Krishna.
grantha	— a script in use in Tamilnad for writing the Sanskrit language, a couplet having 16 voiced letters to each line
guru	— spiritual preceptor
Harijan	— one of low caste
Inbam	— love.
isai	— music
itihasa	— ancient grand epic.
iyal	— literary matter, chapter in a book.
Jain	— a religious sect following the Jina.
jnana	— superior knowledge, enlightenment.
Kalaviyal	— section of poetics on clandestine love.
kalippa	— one of the four kinds of metre.
kalitturai	— a variant of that metre kalivenba	— the venba metre, going on to many couplets without limit of lines kallar	— robber, name of a clan.
kama	— love theme
kanda	— section of book.
karma	— the theory that action inevitably causes an experience of its effect.
katha	— story
kavi	— a poem, a poet.
kavya	— an epic, a poem.
kirttanai	— musical piece
kovai	— a string of verses; a poem of 400 verses giving topics from the love theme in a continuous narrative.
krida	— sport.
kriya	— ceremonial worship, ritual
kural	— a couplet, variant of venba
kurava	— a hill tribe, gipsy.

kurinji	—	the hill and hilly tracts, love themes relating to them.
kuttu	—	dance
Lokayata	—	materialist.
Malai	—	garland (of songs)
mani	—	gem, jewel
manipravala	—	a type of Tamil prose which employs a large admixture of Sanskrit words and phrases mantra	—	mystic syllable, sacred formula.
marapu	—	literary convention
marutam	—	the pastoral land, love themes relating thereto
meykkirtti	—	the introductory part of a king's inscription setting forth his praises
moli	—	utterance, word
moksha, mukti	—	salvation, liberation
mudal	—	first
mullai	—	the forest area, love themes relating thereto
mutt (math)	—	monastery
mut-Tamil	—	three divisions of Tamil - iyal , isai and natakam
Nalayiram	—	four thousand, the Vaisnava canon
nambi	—	a nobleman among men
nanuru	—	four hundred narpatu	—	forty
natakam	—	dance and drama
nayaka nayaki bhava	} —	emotional poetic approach of the lover and the lady-love nayanar	—	a Saiva saint (plural nayanmar)
neidal	—	the coastal area, love themes relating thereto
nighantu	—	a lexicographical work in verse
nondi	—	lame person.
nul	—	book.
nurpa	—	a type of metre, the asiriyam , corresponding to blank verse, an aphorism.
nuru	—	hundred.
Oduvar	—	devaram singer.

Pa	—	verse
padal	—	song
padam	—	musical mode, generally on a love theme padikam	—	a decad, a devotional poem of ten verses
palai	—	the desert, love themes relating thereto
pallandu	—	a poem of benediction, many years.
pan	—	musical tune
pana	—	a minstrel, considered of low caste paripadal	—	a type of metre for early musical verse
pattiyal	—	manual of poetics
pattu	—	song
periya	—	large, senior.
perum-kappiyam	—	major epic
porul	—	subject matter of poetry, wealth.
prabandha	—	a poetic composition
puja	—	ceremonial worship
pulavar	—	poet
puram	—	themes relating to peace and war, other than love
purana	—	an ancient story, large epic type of poetic work celebrating the glory of some deity or a great being.
Rishi	—	sage, seer
Saiva	—	a follower of Siva
sakti	—	the power of God personified as the mother goddess in modern parlance, His consort in legends
sangham	—	legendary academy or body of Tamil men of letters in Madurai, before the Christian era
sasana	—	inscription
sastra	—	scripture, science
sen-Tamil	—	literary Tamil
seyyul	—	verse
siddha	—	a realised soul
smṛiti	—	a law book with scriptural authority
sthala	—	holy place
sutra	—	aphorism
Talattu	—	lullaby
talisaṭ	—	a kind of verse,

tapas	—	penance
ṭmai	—	situation and behaviour relating to the five regions and others, both aḥam and puram
tirattu	—	collection or selection of verses.
tiru	—	a prefix meaning sacred, holy tirumoli	—	holy word
tohai	—	collection
Upanishad	—	the last section of the veda having philosophical import
urai	—	commentary
Vadakalai	—	northern sect of Vaiṣṇavism
vaidika	—	relating to the veda, orthodox Hindu
vahai	—	symbol of victory, the laurel
Vaiṣṇava	—	a follower of Viṣṇu
vallal	—	one who gives, a patron
vanji	—	a creeper, a metre in prosody
vedanta	—	the end of the Veda, a school of philosophy
venba	—	a verse of four lines, with four feet to the line, one of the four ancient metres
vetci	—	ixora , a flower
vidu	—	liberation
virali	—	singer-cum-dancer (woman)
Vira Saiva	—	a later sect of Saivism where the wearing of the Siva linga on the body is important
viruttam	—	a later type of easy fluent metre, with four lines, of the same foot arrangement
vyakarana	—	grammatical treatise (Sanskrit)
vyakyaṇa	—	commentary
Yal	—	a stringed musical instrument of the past
yalp-pana	—	a pana who sang to the accompaniment of his yal
yoga	—	union

CHRONOLOGY OF THE LITERATURE

A chronology of the authors and the works discussed in this book is given here. It is hoped that this will aid an understanding of the subject in the right historical perspective. It is however not claimed that this is the final word on the matter. Yet, this is a definite step forward on all matters which had generally been passed over, or which had been dealt with in a cursory or non-committal manner, by writers and historians to this day.

Period upto 300 B C	The First Sangham and the Second Sangham, Tolkappiyam, poets like Muraṇṇiyur Muḍinagarayar
300 B. C to 100 A D	Ettutthoḥai — except Kalittoḥai and Paripadal, Pattuppattu
100 to 200	Kalittoḥai and Paripadal, Tīrukkural
200 – 300	Silappadhikaram
300 – 400	Nanmanik-katigaḥ, Tīr-kadukam and Muḍumollik-kaṇṇi
400 – 500	Iniya 40, Inna 40, Kalaval 40 Karaikkal ammai and Tīrumular
500 – 600	Aintinaḥ 50, Aintinaḥ 70, Tinaimol 50, Tinaimalai 150, Kaṇṇinilai, Kar 40 Sīrupanchamulam, Eladī. Maṇimekhalai The first Three Alvars — Poḥaiyar, Bhutattar and Peyalvar
600 – 700	Naladiyar and Palamoli, Acarakkovai Sambandar, Appar, Aiyadigal Kadavarkon Tiruppan alvar, Tīrumanisai alvar and Tondaradippodi alvar. Paṇḍikkovai,

- 700 - 800 Period of great literary activity in Tamil grammar, particularly poetics, Panniru patalam Iraiyanar kalaviyal and its commentary, orally composed
A second Agastya and Tolkappiyar, and scores of pattiyaal treatises and other grammatical works Perum kathai. Muttollayiram and others
Sundarar and Seraman Perumal
Atravadigal and Ilam-perumanadigal
Kulasekharar, Periyalvar, Andal, and Tirumangai alvar
- 800 - 900 Divakaram, Purapporul venba malai, Tamil neri vilakkam, Panca marapu Kalaviyal urai written down
Kambar, Cintamani, Valaiyapati
Bharata venba, Nandikkalambakam
Manikkavacakar, Tirukkova
Nammalvar, Madhura kavai
- 900 - 1000 Pingalar, Pannirupattiyaal
Kundalakesi, Nilakesi, Culamani
Manakkudavar Kural urai
Tirumaligai devar, Gandaradittar, Sendanar, Tiruvai Amudanar 11th Book of the Saiva Canon such as Kapilar, Paananar, Kalladar, Pattinattar
Tiri-Siramalai antadi
Jinendra malai
- 1000 - 1100 Yapparunkalam and Karikai Virasoliyam
Yapparunkalam and Karikai Commentaries
Ilampuranar Tolkappiya urai
Kalladam Tiruvalluvamalai
Silappadhikara arumpada urai.
Karuvur Devar, Nambiyandar Nambi
Kana nul
- 1100 - 1200 Gunavirapanditar, Dandi
Perumdevanar Virasoliya urai.
Kalingattupparani, Sekkilar, Ottakkuttar
Adiyarkku nallar Attisudi etc. of Avvai.
Tiru Undiyar, Tiruk-Kalutrup-padiyar,

Jnanamirtam

Ramanuja nurrantadı, Satakopar-antadı, Sarasvati antadı Tiruvaymoli-arayirappadı

Arunkalacceppu

Tillai Ula, Puhalur antadı, Ambikapati kovai.

1200 - 1300 Nannul, Nambi ahapporul Tolkappiyam commentators — Perasiriyar, Senavaraiyar

Puhalendi Nalavenba.

Kalingar Kural urai, Parimelalagar, Perasiriyar Kovai urai Many commentaries on Ettut-tohai and 18 Kilik-kanakku

Nambi Tiruvilayadal

Aranericcaram, Yasodara kavyam

Kulottunga Cholan Kovai, Sankara Cholan Ula, Hnanya vataip-parani, Tanjai Vanan kovai

Mekandar, Arulnandi, Manavasakam Kadandar

Bhattar — Tamil Bhagavad gita

Nanjayar, Idu, Periyavaccan pillai, Guru para m parai six thousand

Siddhar-arudam, Ullamudaiyan

1300 - 1400 Navanittappattiyai, Uriccol nighantu Kalaviyal karikai

Mayilainathar Nannul urai.

Villi Bharatam, Irattaiyar

Umapati sivam

Agastiyar devaram selection

Kacciappa Sivacariyar Kanda puranam

Naccinarkkiniyar — commentaries on Tolkappiyam, Pattupattu, Kalittohai and Cintamani

Tirunurrantadı, Meru mantara puranam, Jiva Sambhodanai

Siva vakkiyar, later Avvai, Pattinattar

Sirrambala Nadigal and his line of disciples,

Tattuvaprakasa Kalottara

Vedanta desikar, Pillai Lokacharya and his group Gitai venba

Beginning of Saiva sastra commentaries.

- 1400 - 1500 Gayadhara nighantu
 Arunagiri nathar, Kalamegham
 Kadambari, Purattirattu
 Many miscellaneous commentators — Pariti, Kalladar, Deivac-cilai etc
 Tiru Vadavurar puranam, Upadesa Kandams.
 Miscellaneous theological writers in Saivism
 Tattuvarayar
 Manavala mamuni
 Sri puranam
 Varuna kuladittan madal, Kapilar ahaval
 Tiruccendur Pillai Tamil
 Minor siddhas like Pambatti siddha, Teraiyar
 Kanakkadhikaram
- 1500 - 1600 Tirrkkurugai perumal Kavirayar, his Maran
 Alankaram and other grammatical manuals
 Revana siddha and his Aharadi nighantu,
 Gudamani nighantu Cidambarap-pattiyal
 Harischandra puranam, Pururava-caritam
 The three Pandiyas — Varagunarama, Varatunga rama and Ativirarama Kamalai Jnanaprakasa, Niramba Alagiyar, Saiva Ellappa Navalar, Anadhar, Tirumalai
 natha etc — puranams
 Bhagavata by Sevvaic-cuduvar and Arulala dasar, Irusamaya vilakkam Sivagrayogi Saiva commentaries Guru Jnanasambandha
 Some Vaishnava works of Tirukkurugaip-perumal
 Many Prabandhas Kaviraja panditar
- 1600 - 1700 Prayoga vivekam, Ilakkana vilakkam
 Nighantus — Bhaiati dipam, Asiriya nighantu
 Prabodha candrodayam
 Puranams like Tiru Arur, Puvanam, Sikalatti, Tiruccendur The first kirttanam
 Numerous Saiva treatises
 Vira Saivas — Sivaprakasa swami, Santalingar, Kumara devar, Cidambaraswami
 Kumara gurupara, Padikkasu, Antakakkavi Viraraghava Many ballad poems.

- Many Saiva commentaries
 Swaminatha desikar — Ilakkanakkottu, poems Pillaippperumal Aiyangar
 Tamil navalar caritai Umaruppulavar
- 1700 – 1800 Tonnul Vilakkam, Catur aharadi, some nighantu works Beschī
 Kural venba poems — Vadamalai venba, Tirumalai venba, Tiruttondar venba etc
 Nallap-pillai — elaboration of Villi Bharatam
 Vadamalayappa pillayan — puranas
 Paranjoti munivar Adiyappa navalar Sivarahasyam Sivajnanaswami, Kacciyappar and many others
 Many Saiva commentators Tayumanavar Abhirami antadi
 Tandavarayar — Kaivalya navanitam
 Basava purana
 Ramajaya tiruppuhal
 Miscellaneous Satakam poems
 Mukkudal pallu and other pallu poems, Nondi natakam and Kuravanji Eminent minor poets — Supradipa, Palapattadai
 Sokkanathap-pulavar, Tiri-kuta rajappa kavirayar
 Musical composers — Muttu Tandavai, Marimuttap-pillai, Arunachala-kavi Ballad writing — Desingurajan kathai etc
- 1800 – 1900 Muthuvira-kavirayar — Muttuviriyam Tamil Kuvalayanandam
 Minakshisundaram pillai — old school purana poetry
 Arumukha navalar — birth of modern prose
 Pancataniram, Vinodarasamanjari
 Ramalingaswami — Devotional poems and prose

Gopalakrishna bharatī, Ananta bharatī — musical pieces

Vedanayakam pillai — kirttanai, Nittinul and novel

Mambalakkavi, Sivakkolundu desikar, Dandapani swami — Puranams and minor poems

Nellayappa Kavirayar — Nellaip-puranam

Anthologies like Tanippadal tirattu etc

Innumerable minor poets like Annamalai reddyar, Subbaraya swami and Alagiya Sokkanatha pillai, many musical composers

Krishna pillai — Christian books

Operas and dramas by many writers

Prose writers such as Viraswami Cettiyar, Toluvur Velayudha mudaliyar, Tandavaraya mudaliyar, Sabhapati navalar and scores of others

1900 -

The era of Subrahmanya Bharatī Only minor poets.

The era of scholarly edition of classics by Dr Swaminatha Aiyar

Writing proceeds on the following lines
Adult reading books, autobiography, biography, children's literature, detective fiction, dictionary making, drama, essays, letters, linguistics, literary criticism, musical pieces, novel, poetry, research papers, scientific writing, short story, travelogue, and journalistic and political writing, translations from English and from the North Indian languages mostly of stories, novels and drama

BIBLIOGRAPHY

I Political history of the Tamilnad

- 1 The Pandiyan Kingdom by K A Nilakanta Sastri
- 2 The Pandiyas by T V Sadasiva Pandarattar, 1966 (Tamil)
- 3 The Colas by K A Nilakanta Sastri, 2 volumes, University of Madras 1935-37
- 4 The Later Cholas by T V Sadasiva Pandarattar, 2 Volumes, Annamalai University 1958 (Tamil)
- 5 The Pallavas by M Rajamanikkam 1968 (Tamil).
- 6 Serar varalaru, Avvai S Duraisami pillai 1960 (Tamil).
- 7 Gangas of Talakkad, M V Krishna Rao

II History of Tamil Literature

- 1 The history of Tamil literature by Jesudasans (1961) contains a very exhaustive bibliography of 46 books on the history of Tamil literature, both in English and in Tamil. The list inevitably contains reliable and critical books and books which are purely a collection of legends
- 2 A History of Tamil Literature by C Jesudasan and Hephzibah Jesudasan, 1961
- 3 A History of Tamil Language by T P Minakshisundaram, Poona 1965
- 4 A History of Tamil Literature by T P Minakshisundaram, Annamalai University 1965
- 5 A History of Tamil Literature by J M Soma-sundaram, Volume I 1967
- 6 A History of Tamil Literature by M Arunachalam 10th century 1972, 11th century 1971, 12th century in 2 volumes 1973, 13th century 1970, 14th century 1969, 15th century 1969 (all in Tamil)
- 7 A History of Tamil Literature by M Varadarajan, Sahitya Akademi 1972 (Tamil)

III Texts of the Books

These have generally been indicated at the end of each section of this book

IV Others

- 1 Peruntolai, M Raghava Aiyangar, 1936
- 2 Guru paramparai six thousand, 1878,

INDEX

[Names of books and poetic themes are given in italics]

- Abhinaya 47-8
Abhirami antadi 211
 Abhirami bhattar 192
Atarakkovar 92-3, 177-8, 202
 acarya 214
Adaikkalamalai 281
adangal murai (Devaram) 167
adangal murai (Tattuvarayar) 219
Adhikan 290, 330
Adiyarkkunallar 4, 9, 16, 18-20, 22, 24, 28, 39, 47-8, 195, 198-9, 210, 228, 274-5, 296, 331
Adukotpattu soraladan 290
adu pambe 268
advaita 217
Advaita venba 222
agamas 177-8
Agastya 17, 21-2, 25-6, 29, 39, 46, 197, 257, 274, 284
Agattiyam 17, 25
aham 18, 27, 31, 56, 61, 66, 70, 78, 90-8, 95, 129, 160-1, 163, 199, 207, 238, 243, 272, 330-2
Ahananuru 56-7, 59, 65, 95, 256, 289, 314, 320
Ahappy siddha 263
ahapporul 40, 46, 227
Ahapporul vilakkam (Nambi) 27, 229
Aharadi 37
Aharadi nighantu 37, 222
ahaval 37
aindilakkanam 21
Aindra vyakarana 15, 30
Ainkuru nuru 56, 59-60, 65, 71, 94
aintinai 31
Aintinai aimbatu 92, 94
Aintinai arupatu 94
Aintinai elupatu 92, 94
Aiyadikal kadavarkon 145
Aiyur Mudavanar 285
Ajnavatarpparan 219, 241
Alagiya manavala jiyar 218 alankaram 34
Alavandar 163, 203
albizzia 32
alchemy 274
Aliyarp pulavar 281
Alli arasani malai 265
alliyam 47
Aluguni siddha 263
alvar 48, 115-6, 118, 148, 187, 214, 216, 218
Amalanadipiran 158
Ambikai malai 192, 211
Ambikapati kovai 192, 211
America 322
Amirtha valli kathai 268
Amitasagara 26, 197
Ammaicci 293
ammanai 254, 266, 269
ammanai ppattu 266
Amutanar 165, 214
ananda-kalippu 263
Ananta bharati 51
Anantarama aiyar 65
Andal 154-8, 212, 214, 242, 251-2, 291
Andhra 313
angamalai 238, 253
ani (a branch of Tamil) 34
Ani yal 34-5

- Annamalai reddy 281
antadi 288, 243-4 Antakakavi viraraghava 285, 298
 anthologies 256-60
 anti-Sanskrit movement 324
Appandai nathar ula 229
 Appar 16, 20, 75, 129-34, 136, 139, 160-1, 167, 186, 191, 198, 253, 291
 Appudi 132, 134
 Appulingam 243
 Arabia 6, 280 Arabic 280
aram 77-9, 173, 181, 257
Araneri charam 179, 227
 Arasakesari 104
arattuppal 76
Arayirappadi 213, 297, 303
Arbhuta-tiru antadi 147 architecture 12, 273
 Arhat 229
 Ariyalur malavarayar 276
arruppadai 13, 66, 68, 238-40
artha 181
 artha sastras 77
 Arulala dasai 171, 233
 Arulnandi sivam 205-6
 Arulnilai visaka 170
 Arumukha navalar 209-10, 300-3
 Arunachalakkavi 42-3, 49
Arunachala purana 200
 Arunagiri natha 23-4, 41, 188-192, 193, 216
Arungalac-cheppu 228
 Aryan 4, 128
 Asalambikai ammai 286, 293
Asiriyai malai 330
asiriyappa 12-3, 27, 56, 59, 61, 66-7, 86, 90, 93, 95, 106, 174, 204, 207, 226, 238, 244, 315, 330 Asoka 306
 astaksara 159
Asta prabandam 71, 216
 astrology 12, 273 astronomy 7
asukavi 283
 Atankottasan 29
 Atharva veda 163
 Ativirarama pandiya 103, 179, 287, 293
Attai sudi 178, 292
Avinayam 197
 Avinayanar 197
 Avirodhi alvar 223
 Avvai 23, 53, 71, 123, 173, 178-81, 186, 262-3, 284, 288, 290, 292-3 Ay 285, 308
 avar 156-7, 251, ayarpadi 153
 Ay chiefs 308
 ayonija 149, 158
 Balakrishna Pillai 45
 ballads 265-8
 — classes of 266 ball games 266, 269
 Banaras 217
 Basava 222-3
Basava purana 223
 Beschi 37, 276-7, 285
Bhagavad Gita 218-9
Bhagavata 52 105, 163, 170-1, 215-6, 233
 Bhagavat vishayam 303
 bhajana 42, 193
 bhakti 101, 140, 146, 202, 208, 235, 264
 Bhakti sara 212
bharani 240-2, 251, 269
Bharatam 52, 57, 169-70, 318, 329
 bharata natya 48
 Bharata sastra 48
Bharata senapatiyam 47
 Bharati, Subrahmanya 91, 193, 211, 323
 Bhattar 149, 218-9
 Bhavanandam Pillai 28, 302
 Bhavanandai academy 28, 35
 Bhoga siddha 274
 Bhuta pandiya's queen 62, 284, 290

- Bhutattalvar 149-50, 185
Bimbisara kathai 280
 biographical purana 285
 black arts 274
 blank verse 37
 blind poets 276-7, 285-6
Brahma gita 219
Brahma sutra 207
brahmi script 12, 306
 brahminism 116
Brahmottara kanda
Brhad katha 106
 Brhatta, Aryan prince 69
 British domination 11
 Buddha 9, 112, 280
 Buddhāmitra 280
 Buddhism 99, 182, 280
 — four schools of 281
 Buddhist logic and philosophy 89
 Buddhists 77, 280
 Buddhist writing 280-1
 Bunyan 279
 Cadjan leaf books 309
 Cape comorin 3
 Caldwell 277
 carnatic music caste 8, 81
Catur aharadī 37, 277
 Ceylon 104, 281, 312
chandam 241-2 changes in Tamil letters 309-12 chemistry 273 chess 275
 China 6
 Chola nad 307
Cholar caritram 320-1
 Cholas 4-6 40-1, 48 9, 70, 140, 142, 156, 158, 208, 314
 Christian conversion 210, 276
 Christian writers 276 9
 Cidambaram 41, 187-8, 142, 281 Cidambaram pillai, V O 302
 Cidambara swami 188, 223 cinema 5-2, 54
 Cinnamanur plates 17
Cintamani 100, 146-7, 199, 226, 284, 275, 298
Citrakavi 254, 288
Citraputran kathai 266
 Cokkalingam pillai, Vanur 286
 Cokklingam, Raya 248
 Commentaries 194-201, 296
 Commentaries, their value 185
 Commentators 194-200
 Compilation of Ettu-tohai 56
 Common man 326, 328
 Compassion 262
 Comparative Dravidian
 Philology 277
 Concept of ethics 181-3
 Copper plate grants 312
 couplet 76, 270 court poet 284 cradle of the human race 3 crimes of the alvar 161
Cudamani nighantu 37, 225
Culamani 100, 106, 11, 118, 226, 283
Dakkayagapparani 207, 241
Damili 306
 Damodaram pillai 28, 65, 105, 113, 302
 dance 46 9
 dances, seven 47
 Dandapani swami 286
 Dandi 27, 84-5, 97
Dandi alankaram 28, 34
 Dantivarman 162
dasangam 254
 Dasaratha 153
 Deivasikhamani goundar 331 deluge 3
 De Nobili 276
 Deśika Vinayakam pillai 267, 286, 323
 Desingurajan kathai 266
Devanagari 311
 Devaraja pillai 105
Devaram 20, 40-2, 45, 186,
 141-3, 147, 190, 257, 321

- devotional poetry 184-98, 202-3, 209, 273
 Dhanvantri 274
dharma 78, 99, 181
 Dhaimapuram 206
 Dharmi 17
 dictionary 37-8
 didactic literature 279
 Digambara jain 91
Divakaram 36, 308
Divya prabandham 148
 drama 49-54, 278
 dramatic element in sangham poetry 57 dramatic literature 50-4
 Dramidopanishad etc 168
 Dramila sangha 19
dravidi 307
 Dravidian group 3 dream wedding of Andal 291
Drekkanam 274
 Duraiswami Aiyar 250
 Durvinita 106
 Dutch 42
dutu 244, 248-9
 dvaita 217-8
 Eastern Archipelago 6
edutta padam 193
 Egypt 6
 Eight anthologies 55-65, 256
Eladi 92, 94, 176, 227
 Elela singa 74
Eleventh tirumurai 144-5, 256, 259, 314 elukurrirukkai 238, 254
eluttu 25, 29
 Emperor of poesy 114
 Enadi siddha 264
 epic purana 238
 epigraphy 318
 epistolatory verses 259 epic 88, 97, 106, 226
 erotics, science 275
 Erukkattampuliyur 41 ethical poetry 178-188
 ethics 92, 181
Ettu-tohar 55, 57, 98, 196
 Europeans 276-8 Fiction 87 figures of speech 34
 folksongs 267, 269-70
 foreign writers 276
 Four forties 177
 free verse 326
 Gajabahu 86
gamaka 283
 Ganapati 247
 Gandaraditta 142, 284
 Gandhi 77, 79, 81, 143, 192, 286, 293, 329
 Gandhian era 322
Gandhi kavitar 183
 — mahan kathai 268
 — pillai Tamil 243
 — puranam 293
 Ganga chief 106 geology 274
 gipsy women 290 Gita 218-9 girvana 298
 goals of life 173
 Goda 212
 golden age of Chola supremacy
 Gopala aiyar 302 [147
 Gopala Krishna bharati 43, 52, 209, 325
 Govindaraja 19
 Govindaraja mudaliyar 28, 302
 Grammar 25-28, 225
 grammatical anthology 257 grammatical writing 278
grantha 218, 297
 grantha script 12, 307
 grantha - Tamil 317
 Greece 5
 Gunamgudi 281
 Gunavirapandita 27
 Guru Jnana sambandha 206
Guruparampara 158, 166, 214, 216
 Handicapped poets 285
 Harijan poets 285
Harisamaya dipam 286
 Harischandra 58, 104

- Harischandra puranam* 104 hero-stones 305, 314-5 hero worship 97
 Himalayas
 Hindus 114
Hiranya vatai pparani 241 historical ballad 266 Homer 168 humour 241 hymns 126-66 hymnologists 127
 Ibuniyantan padaippor 281
 Iconoclasm 261, 284
 Idaikkattu siddha 268, 269
Idu 166, 213, 303
Ilakkana vilakkam 27-8, 104
Ilakkiya manimalai 188
 Ilampuranar 38, 196, 296, 302
 Ilango adigal 86-7, 90, 99, 284
 Ilantirayan 68
Iliad 168
inbam 78, 173, 181, 257-8 independence 15
 India 3
Indira kaliyam 40, 47
Indira vila 83
Iniya narpatu 92, 94, 176
Inna narpatu 92, 94, 176
 inscriptions 312-21
 — form and content 315-6
 — value 316
 — verses 258
 Ionian Greeks 62
 Iraiyanar 17, 26, 259
Iraiyanar kalaviyal 16-7, 19-20, 25-26, 59, 169, 194-7, 227-8,
 250, 295, 302
Irattai manimalai 145, 238, 255
Irattai ppulavar 284, 288
 Irumporai Seral 225
Irupa irupatu 255
isai 21-3, 39-45, 64-5, 87, 141, 198
Isai nunukkam 39, 47
Isakki kathai 268
Isvara gita 219
itai yal 86
itihasa 167-72
Itihasa bhagavata 233
ixora 32
iyal 21, 23, 25, 29, 87, 198
Iyal pa 148, 158-9, 163
 Jaffna 210
 Jain epics 226
 — ethics 227
 — literature 225-9
 — manipravala 229
 — nuns 293
 — sangham 19
 — works 11, 14
 Jainism 127, 130, 225
Javvaduppulavar 281
Jayamkondar 240-1, 284
Jesudasan 82, 123, 125, 158, 166, 250
 Jesuit writers 276, 299
 Jina 9
Jinendramalai 274-5
Jivakacintamani 100, 106, 108-12
Jivakarunya olukkam 300
Jiva sambodhanai 228, 298, 303
jivatma 220
Jnanak kural 173, 263
Jnanamritam 204
Jnana sambandha 23, 40
 Johnson, Dr 325 journalism 322, 325
Kacciyaappa munivar 235
Kacciyaappa sivacarya 102, 171, 208, 233, 235
kadal (poem) 249
 kadamba flower 185
Kadambari 104
Kadaram 281
Kadavul ma munivar 208, 235
Kadiyalur 70
Kadunkon pandiya 91, 126
Kadumko, palai padiya perum 313-4
Kaduvan Ilaveyinar 185
Kaduveli siddha 263
kaikkilai 31
Kainnilai 92, 94
Kaivalya nayanitam 220

- Kakkai padinī 289-90
 Kalabhra interregnum 18, 25, 40, 74
 Kalabhras 20, 28, 41, 46-7, 88, 91, 126, 140, 143, 149,
 158, 196, 225
 Kaladī 217
kalambakam 243-4, 269
 Kalamegham 248, 283, 288
Kalavali narpatu 92, 94-5, 177, 255
Kalavīyal karikai 250
 Kalī 240
 Kalīdasa 104, 248
 Kalikkama 135
 Kalīnga 240
 Kalingarayan 319
Kalingattupparam 45, 240-1
kalippa 12, 27, 61, 111, 315
Kalittōhar 13, 56-7, 60-1, 65, 92, 94, 199, 250
kalitturai 244
kalivenba 238, 247, 249
 Kalkī 325
Kalladam 207
 Kalladar 284
Kallalagar ammanai 268
 kallar 161
 Kalugumalai 271-2
Kalvetṭiyal 320-1
 Kalyanasundara mudaliyar
 192, 325
 Kama 182
 Kamandaka 75
Kamanul 274-5
Kamasutra 75
Kamattuppal 76, 80-1
 Kambar 28, 101, 111, 114,
 154, 169-70, 208, 233, 300, 384
Kamba ramayana 49, 51, 72
 101-2, 114-25, 238
 Kanakkadhikaram 274
 Kanakasabhapati pillai 302
kanalvari 39
Kananul 274-5
 Kanarese 104
Kancī (city) 5, 68, 89, 149, 150, 162, 169, 206, 215, 217,
 244, 333-4
Kancippuranam 235
Kandapuranao-curukkam 172
Kanda puranam 52, 72, 102,
 171-2, 208, 233, 300
Kandar alankaram 189-90
Kandar anubhūti 189
Kandar kalivenba 188
kanji 69
 Kannada 10, 307, 313
 Kannaki 82-7, 98-9, 289
 Kannaki cult 87
Kannamma songs 263
Kanneluttu 311
 Kannudaiya vallal 219
 Kapatapuram 16, 19, 195
 Kapilar 71, 267, 284, 69, 318
Kapilar akaval 267
 Karaikkal ammai 143-4, 158, 185, 202, 290
Karandai 332
 Karapatra Sīvapī akasa swami
 258
Kar ettu 96
 Kari 162
 Karigai kulattur 318
 Karikalan 5, 9, 66-7, 70, 290
 karma 9, 90, 99, 178
Kar narpatu 92, 95, 177
Karuai antadi 188
 Karuvur devar 142
 Kasī mutt 200-1 katha kalakshepam 295, 302
Kathavarayan kathai 268
 Kattabomman 266
Kattalaikkalitturai 27, 244 kauntī 293
 Kautilya 75
 Kavadi 271-2
 kavadi-cindu 270-2
 Kaval pendu 290
Kavarī Murugan pillai Tamil
 248

- Kaveri 5-6, 43, 67, 140, 148, 150, 152
 Kaverippattinam 5, 70
 kavi 283
 kavic-cakravartī 242
 Kaviraja pandita 210
 kavi-singam 286
Kavya darsam 34
 Kerala 3, 313
kil 92
Kilikkanni 270-2
Kilk-kanakku 65, 92-6, 174, 177-9, 200, 227, 288, 255, 330 kirttanam 42-5
 Koc-cengat Chola 96, 161, 255 kodukottī 47
Kokkoham 275
Kolai maruttal 223
 koleluttu 307
 Kongu country 85, 100, 106
 Konguvel 100, 106
Konraivendan 177-9, 292
 Kopperum chola 68
 Kopperum singa 318, 321
 Korkai 5
 Korraṇai 184
 Kosalanadu 116
 Kottamangalam Subbu 268
kottumbi 161 269
kovai 31, 199, 244-6, 255
 -story 245
Kovalan kathai 264
 Kṛṣṇa 153 5, 242, 253
 Kṛṣṇnamurti R. (Kalki) 325
 Kṛṣṇa pillai 279
 Kṛṣṇaswami Aiyar T M 193
 Kṛṣṇavatara 154
Kucelopakhyanam 105
Kudal purana 216
kula manī duram 161
 Kulasekhara alvar 152-5,
 157 8, 284
 Kulasekhara pandiya 211
 kulavanikan 90
 Kulottunga Chola I 23, 41,
 49, 231, 240-1
 Kulottunga Chola II 146 242
 Kulottunga Chola III 318
Kuluva natakam 50
 Kumara 18
 Kumara deva 222
 Kumara gurupara swamī 179, 188, 209, 211
 Kumudavallī 159, 166
 Kunda kundacarya 73
Kundalakesi 112, 228, 230 289 kundalini sakti 263
Kural 11, 19, 60 73 82 87-8,
 114, 116, 136, 173-5, 179,
 181-2, 200, 227, 257, 278, 287, 296 320
kural venba 76, 93, 173, 180-1, 228 kurava 50
kuravai 22, 269
Kuravanji poem 43, 50
kurinji 13, 31, 69-70, 94, 332
Kurinji-p-pattu 69
Kurma purana 232
Kurralak-kuravanji 50
Kurralap-purana 233
 Kurugai piran pillan 213, 297
Kuruhur manmiyam 216
Kuruntirattu 219, 258
Kuruntohai 17, 56 61, 65, 72,
 95, 145, 256, 259, 286,
 289 Kutambai siddha 263
 kuttar 48
Kuttar arruppadai 70
Kutti - Tiruvacakam 188
kuttu 47
Kuvalayanandam 35
 Labbai alim 281
Lalita sistora 307
Lakshana 28
 Lakshmana Pillai 53 lamentations 262 lame poets 285
lexicography 36

- lexicon 12, 36-8
Linga purana 232 local ballad 208 logic 228 lokayata 205 loss of books 273 love of God 143 love theme 331-2
 lullaby 270
 lyric poetry 129, 144
Macca-purana 232
madal 160, 238, 244, 247-8
 Madhavi's dance 22
 Madhura kavī 158, 162, 165
madhura kavī 233
 Madhvacharya 217-8
 Madras 281, 329
 Madurai 4, 16-17, 25, 39,
 46-7, 55, 64, 74, 84, 140,
 194, 207, 289, 313, 338
 Madurai south 195
Maduraiṅkanjī 67, 69, 275
 Madurai Tamil sangham 28, 44, 275, 286
Madurai viran kathai 268
 Magadaip̄perumal 319
 Mahabalipuram 149-150
Mahabharata 5, 97, 115,
 168-9, 216, 265
 — episodes 52
Mahapurana 232
 Maharajan, S 115, 125
 Major epics 98
 Mahratta rulers 42
 malai 22
malai marrumalai 254
Malalai silambu 193
 Malaya 313
 Malayalam 10, 217, 313
 Mambalakkavī 285
 Manakkudavar 198, 227, 296, 302
mananul 110
 Manavala mamunī 149,
 215-6, 296
 Manavur-padikam 230
 Mandala puruda 37
 Mangudi Marudanar 69
 Mangayarkkarasī 289-90
 Manikkavacakar 136-9, 164,
 166, 187, 191 208, 231,
 244, 246, 252-4, 278, 291
Manimekhalai 83, 88-91, 99, 100, 226, 230, 289
manipravala 12, 200, 206,
 212-4, 229, 296-8
 Manmata worship 157, 291
Manonmaniyam 53, 323-4, 329
 Mantaram seral irumporai 60
 Manu 75
manumurai kanda vacakam 300 manuscript writing 308
 Maraijnana sambandha 205
maram 238
Maran alankaram 35
marapiyal 36
marapu 32
Marimutha pillai 42-3, 51
 Margali 156
Markandeya purana 231
Markandeyar amman 263
 Marudur antadi 285
Marumakkalvali manmīyam 267
marutam 13, 31, 59, 70, 94 332 maruta manikkam 193 masses, poetry for 262, 270
 Mastan sahib 281
 Matai 104
 Mathematics 7, 12, 273-4
Mativanar natakat-Tamil nul 47 matriarchal system 268
Mavindam 329
 Mayilai nathar 28, 200, 303
 Mayuram 278
Mayurap̄-puranam 208, 234
 Mecca 280
 Medicine 7, 12, 273, 275
Meghasandesā 248
 Meikandar 204
 Meip̄porul nayanai 319
meikkirtti 315
melkanakku 65

Merumantara purana 226, 238
 metallurgy 274
 Milton 133
Minakshi ammai pillai Tamil 211, 243
 minor epics 98
Minakshi sundaram pillai
 209, 235, 243, 326
Minakshi sundaram, T P 158
 minor poems 238-255
 miracles 129, 134 missionaries 276 modern period 322-9
Mohaidin puranam 281
 Mohammedan invasion 11,
 14, 48, 236, 317
 Mohammed Hussain 281
 Mohammed Ibrahim 281
Mohavataip-parani 219
 moksha 182 monastery 206
Mudal alvar 149, 158, 185
Mudal ayiram 148 158, 167
Mudamosiyar 285
Mudat-tamakkanni 66-7, 285, 290
Mudat-tirumaran 285
Mudumolik-kanyu 92-3, 176-8
Mudurai 178, 292
Mukkudal pallu 50
mullai 13, 30, 59, 68, 70, 94, 382 Mullai-pattu 68
mummanikkovai 145, 238, 255
Munurai araiyar 175
Muranjiyur mudinagarayar
 16, 169
Muruga 9, 39, 64, 66-7, 69,
 142, 184-5, 209-10, 236,
 247, 270-1
Murugappa 268 music 273
 musical instruments in inscriptions 314
Musiri 5
 Muslim writers 280-2
Muttarayar 174

Mut-Tamil 13 21-4, 39,
 46-7, 90, 198
Muttollayiram 330
Muttukumaraswami pillai -
 Tamil 243
Muttut-Tandavar 23-4, 42-3, 51, 209, 325
Muttuviriyam 27
Muvar ammanai 269
Mylapore 74, 149
Mysore 313 mystic 264
 mysticism 202, 264
Naccellai 289-90
Naccinarkkiniyar 33, 70, 72,
 196, 199-201, 227, 274-5, 296 Nachiyar Tirumoli 156
nadasvaram 41
Nagappattinam 231
Nagaswami 320-1
 nagari script 308, 311
Nagercoil 268
naidatam 103, 293
Nainar labbai alim 280
Nakkannai 289
Nakkirar 66, 145, 194, 197, 227 284, 286-7
Naladi 92, 94, 174-5, 179, 227 256, 278
Nalankilli 9
Nala venba 103, 105, 229
Nalayirap-prabandham 148,
 154, 166-7, 297
Nallanduvanar 61
Nallappillar bharatam 170
Nallathangal kathai 267
Nallivakkodan 67
Nalvali 178, 292
Namasivaya mudaliar 19-20, 301-3
Nambi ahapporul 27, 31, 225, 229
Nambiyandar nambi 41, 45,
 128, 189, 143-5, 203, 235
Nambi tiruvilayadal 208

- Nammalvar 148, 158, 162-5, 188, 212-4, 252, 256, 297
 namo narayana mantra 149
 Nampillai 297
Nanajivavatak kattalai 220
 Nandanai 52
Nandanar kuttanai 48, 52
Nandik kalambakam 49, 243,
 Nandi nagari 308 [251
 Nandivarman III 169, 244
Nanmanikkadigai 92, 175-6
Vanmani malai 145, 255
Nanmukhan tiru antadi 158
 Nanna 70, 318
Vanneri 228
Nannul 27-8, 30, 197, 202, 225
 Nappasalai 289
 Napputanar 68
Varada caritai 226
 Naralokaviran 319
 Narasimha pallava 150
 Narayanan 318
 Narayanasami Aiyar 65
Nariviruttam 255
 Naikaviraja nambi 27, 197
Narrinai 56-9, 65, 95, 256
Naruntohai 179
natakam 21, 23-4, 87, 198
 Nataraja 41-2, 47, 188, 142,
 Nathamuni 163, 208 [144
 Naftattanar 67
 nature, description of 130
Nayaka nayaki bhava 153
 Nayak rulers 42, 190
 nayanmar 48, 98, 115-6, 118, 140, 162, 202, 218
 Nedumara pandiya 244
Nedunavadar 69
 Neduncadayan 91
 Nedunceliyan 5, 62-3, 66,
 284, 318
Neduntohai 56
nerdal 18, 31, 59, 61, 69, 70, 94, 382
Neminatam 27-8, 197, 225
Nenjavidu dutu 248
New attisudi 180 newspaper printing 304
nighantu 32, 36-7
 Nilakesi 106, 112-3 228, 289
 Nilakkottai zamindar 276
 Nili 112 [29
 Nilam taru tiru vil pandiya
Ninth book, Saiva canon
 142-3, 147, 256
 Niranipavalakkunram 193
Nitineri vilakkam 179
Niti nul 180, 279
Niti saram 179
Niti venba 179
nocci 383
Nondi nataham 142-3, 147, 249, 256
 Non-violence and Truth 77, nurpa 27, 37 [79
 Oduvar 132
Odyssey 168
 Okkur masatti 290
 one-world 191 opera 53
 Ophthalmology 273 [329
 Oriental manuscripts library
Orupa orupatu 145
Oruturaiakkovai 255
 Ottakkuttar 207, 242, 284, 287
Padam 24, 42-3
 padan 383
padikam 60, 186, 253, 318
Padinen-kilkanakku 92-6
Padinoram tirumurai 144-5
Padirruppattu 56-7, 61-2, 65,
 Padumanar 174 [256
Paduturai 219
 Paediatrics 273
palai 18, 31, 59, 70, 94, 382
palaippan 67
Palamoli nanuru 92, 94, 175,
 Palaru 6 [179, 227
 Palgrave's Golden Treasury 256
pallandu 142, 154-5, 258
 Pallava 5, 68, 131, 133, 140, 158, 162, 308
palli elucci 238, 251-3
pallu 50, 255

- palmistry 275
 palm leaf 294, 305-6
 Pambatti siddha 263, 269
pan 40-1, 48, 67-8, 150, 203
 Panambaranar 9, 29
Panca lakshana 27
Panca marapu 47, 381
Pancapandavar vanavasam 265
Panca tantiram 255, 303
Pandikkovai 244, 251
 Pandi nadu 307
 Pandiya 4-5, 7, 16, 18, 46, 58, 69, 140
 Pannadu tanda maran valudi
Panniru patalam 26, 257 [58
Panniru pattiyal 26, 257
Pannul tirattu 257
Pa-pavinam 39, 44, 65 paper manuscripts 309 paradise of hippidom 327
Paramartha darsana 218 paramatma 220
 Paranar 284
 Paranjoti munivar 208, 235
 Paravai 185
 Pari 290, 318
 Parimel alagar 198, 296, 302
Paripadal 22 39, 44, 56-7, 64-5, 93-4, 184-5, 198, 256, 293
Paripurana gurukathai 277
 Paritimal kalaiynar 324
Pasavataipparani 241
 Patali putia 311
 patronage 277
Pattinappalai 70, 318
Pattinappalai mandapam 318
Pattinattar 145, 198, 262
Pattinattar padal 257
Pattiragiri 262
Pattuppattu 55, 66, 70, 72, 196, 199, 210, 239, 250, 256
pavar 251-2, 291, 318
 Pavanandi 27
Pavccalur padikam 267
 Penbuddhi malai 281
 Pennaru 6
 people of Tamīlnad 6
 Perasiriyar 38, 196, 199, 201, 244, 284, 296
Periya accan pillai 166, 214
Periya jiyar 215
 periyal 68
Periyalvar 152, 161, 242, 270
Periyalvar tiru molai 154, 159, 216
Periyannan cinnarnan kathai 268
Periyapuvana 52, 72, 101, 135, 145-7, 187-8, 208, 285, 257, Periyaru 6 [300, 319
Periya tiru antadi 163
Periya tiru molai 148, 167
Perumal tiru molai 152
Perum devanai 57, 169, 284, 284, 296
 — Bharata venba 295, 302
Perum kadumgo 284
perum kappiyam 97
Perum kausika 70
Perum-kathai 18, 100, 106-7, 226-7
Perumpan arrupadar 68
Perum sorru udiyan 169
Perum tinai 31
 — tirattu 219, 258
 — tohai 20, 91, 257, 320-1
Peru valudi, mudukudum 9
 Petty chiefs 35
Pey alvar 149-150, 185
 Philosophy of compassion 191 physical handicaps 285
 Pilgrim's progress 279
Pillai Lokacarya 215
 — pandiya 287
 — perumal aiyangar 216
Pillai Tamil 155, 161, 242-3,
Pingala nighantu 36 [250-1
Piratapa mudaliar charitam 279
Pisiri andai 68
 Poetry, need for 294-5
 Poetics 26
 Poets 288-8
 Poets of four categories 283
 Poets of the sangham age 57

- Poets' poverty 284
 Poets with same name 284
Pongattam pongo 161
 Ponmudi 290
 Ponnı 6
 Pope, G U 81 278
 Popularity of some poets 288
 Por 96
porul 25 29, 33, 77, 173, 194, 257
Porul adhikaram 31, 57 69
Porul tohai nighantu 37
 Porunai river 5-6
 porunar 48
Porunar atruppadai 67, 290
porut pal 76-7, 79-80
 Poyhai alvar 149, 150
 Poyhaivar 96, 185
prabandham 51, 66, 196, 209-10, 238, 255
Prabandha marapiyal 238
Prabhodha chandrodayam 104, [219
Prabhu linga lilai 104, 222
 prakrit 10, 307-8, 314 princes as poets 284
 print 309-11
 printing, introduction 276 299, 322
 prose 276, 294, 320
 — early prose 295
 prose poem 326
 proselytisation 276, 299
 prosody 26-7
 Puhalandı 103
 Puhar 4-5, 289
pulambal 262
Pulavar puranam 236
 pulse reading 273
Pumpuliyur natakam 49
 pun 270
 Punitavati 186
Puram 13, 26, 31, 56, 61, 66, 69-70, 92, 95, 238, 256-7 purana 15, 51, 168, 171, 181, 196, 200, 206-9, 216, 232-7 Purana bhagavata 233
purana lakshana 232
Pura nanuru 9, 16, 56-7, 65, 182, 238, 278, 289, 314, 320
 puranic ballad 266
 purapporul 314
Purapporal venbamalai 26, 28 197, 320
Purattirattu 257, 360
 Purikko 58
 Purnacandra sastrı 303
 Pururavas 104
Pucalli 269
 Queen of Bhuta Pandiya 290
 — Varatungarama 293
 Radio 54
 Raghava aiyangar M 20, 257, 320-1
 Raghava aiyangar R. 28, 65
Raghu vamsa 104
 Rajaji 325
 Rajam's edition 24, 45
 Raja pavitrap pallava-taraiyan 197
 Rajaraja chola 238, 41, 49, 139, 142, 308, 315, 319, 321
 Rajasimha pandiya 17
Rajaraja vijayam 49 [9
 Rajasuyam vetta perunar kilı Rajendra chola I 142
 — II 49
 Ramalingaswami 44-5, 188, 191-3, 209, 257, 271, 286, 298, 300
 Ramalinga puranam 293
Rama nataka 43, 51-2
 Ramanuja 163, 165, 187, 203, 212-4, 217-8, 296, 298
Ramanuja nurrantadi 149, 165
Ramavatara 152
Ramayanam 24, 42-3, 97, 150 168-9, 216, 233
Ramayana venba 169
 Ratna nayakar publication
 Ravi varma 53 [264
 Raya-Cokkalingam 181
 regimentation of thought 302, [327

- religious purana 236
 Revana siddha 37, 222, 209 revolt from orthodoxy 264 rhetoric 34-5 Rig veda 163 river based civilization 6
 rockbeds 306, 313
 Rome 5
 Rudram Kannanar 66, 68-70
 Rudra sarma 59
 Russia 322
 Sadasiva pandarattar 20, 320
 Sadayappa vallal 123
 Saiva 14, 17
 Saiva acaryas 23, 202, 315
 — canon 14, 40, 60, 126-47, 158, 200, 202, 204, 210, 246,
 251, 258, 256-7, 259, 261,
 285, 291, 314-5, 318-9
 — commentaries 298
 — hagiology 135, 208
 — literature 202-10
 Saiva manjari
 — pathway to God 206
 — philosophy 205
 — Siddhanta 102, 204, 206, 234-4
 Saiva vidyanupalana press [308
Sakalahala valli malai 210
 Sakkiya 130
 Sakti 9, 209-11
 Sakti worship 192
Salal 161, 269
salarapani 142
 Sama veda 132, 163
 Sambandha 45, 126-31, 134
 136, 141, 160, 174, 186, 254, 291, 318-9, 321
 — as incarnation of Muruga 139
 Sambandha caranalaya 172
 Sambandha mudaliyar 53
 sangha ilakkiyam 65
 sangham 13-4, 16-7, 48, 55, 145, 283
 sangham, second 16, 25
 Sankara bhashya 206
 Sankaracarya 128, 210, 212, 217-20
 Sankara namasivayar 28
Sankara narayanattirattu 258
 Sanskrit 10-1, 16, 28-9, 34-5, 48, 71, 73, 75, 77-8, 101,
 128-9, 140, 168, 171, 188,
 191, 204, 206, 218, 248, 275,
 295-7, 307-8, 314, 307-8
 Sanskrit Tamil 212
 Sanskrit terminology 212
 Santalingaswami 222
Santi purana 226
sappani 161
 Sarakumara 40
 Sarasvati 210-1
Sarasvati antadi 210
 Sarasvati Mahal library,
 Tanjavur 329 [44, 279
Sarvasamaya samarasa kirttanai
Sasana seyyul manjari 321
Sasana Tamil kavir caritam 321
Sasivarna bodham 219
satakam 180
Satamani malai 224
 Sathakopadasa 216, 236
 Sathakopa Ramanujachari 28
Sathakopar antadi 188
 Sattanar 90
 Schweitzer 74, 81 scientific terms 11 script reform 304, 311 sculpture 275
 Sckilar 52, 101-2, 135, 146-7, 235, 284, 319
 — pillai Tamil 243
 — puranam 147
 Sembayan madevi 142
 Senavaraiyar 33, 196, 296, 302
 Sendanar 142, 285
Sengam nadukarkal 320
 Senkuttuvan 5, 85, 91, 98
 Sennakesavalu naidu 28
 Sennikulam 271
Sen Tamil 30, 275

- Seraman kanaikkal Irum-porai 96
 — perumal 135, 145,
 152, 246-7, 284, 314
 Seras 4-5
 Sevvai chuduvār 171, 233
Sevvaṇḍi-puranam 232
Seyttondar puranam 236
seyyul 32
 Shakespeare 49, 53, 246
 Shanmukhasundara mudaliar shape of letters 305 [308 Shihabuddin 281 short story 323
 Siam 156, 158, 291
 Sīdakkadī 280
 siddha medicine 264
 Siddhanta sastras 205
 — Sikhamani 224
 Siddhar jnanak - kovai 280, 261, 264
 Siddhar arudam 274-5
 Siddhas 143-4, 190, 198, 209, 261-4, 284
 Siddha Sivaprakasa 222
 siddha writing 264
 Siddhi 205-6, 298
Siddhiyar, Aruvar urai 303
 S I I Volumes 54
 Sīkalī 42-3, 159, 186
 Sīkhandī 39
Sīlappadhikaram 4, 9, 16, 19, 22, 24, 39, 45-7, 54, 64,
 88-8, 91, 98-9, 175, 184,
 195-6, 198, 210, 226, 280,
 285, 274-5, 295, 302, 31, 331
 Sīrappuṇanam 280
 sīrudaikkalal 193
Sīrupan arruppadai 67
Sīrupanchamulam 92, 176, 227
 sīruyal 68
 Sīttalai sattanar 90, 238, 287
sittuk-kavi 259
 Siva 9, 17
 — advaita 219
 — anubhogatharattu 258
 — dharmottaram 200, 287
 Sivagra yogi 206, 298
Sivagnana bodham 204-5
 — dīpam 222
 — palaya desika 228
 — siddhi 205-6, 281, 281
 — swami 206, 285, 299
Siva mahapurānam 232
 — neri prakasam 206
 — prakasam 205
 — prakasa swami 104, 179, 221-3, 214, 258
 — puja 257
 Sīvavakkīyar 261-2
Skanda purāna 168
 smārtha 128
 smṛiti 177 social handicaps 285 social reform ballads 267 sol 25, 29
 Somasundara, Lord 194 sonnets 324
Soundarya laharī 210
 sources for script 305
 Sṛi Bhaṭṭanaī 218-9
 — Rangam 123, 150, 152-3, 156, 162, 215
 — purāna 229, 298, 303
 — vallabha 154
 — vaiṣṇava brahmins 299
 — villiputtur 154 sthala purāna 208, 216, 223-5
 sthala vṛiksha 162
 Subbairya desikar 141
 Subrahmanya bharatī 170,
 180, 263, 271, 321-2, 328
Sudalai madan kathai 268
 Suddha advaita 218
summelo summulakkay 269
 Sundaram pillai 53
Sundara paṇḍiyam 329
 Sundarar 133-6, 141, 145, 186, 193, 319
sunnam 254 [276-7, 287
 Supradīpa kavirayar 37, surgery 273
 Suryanarayana sastrī 323-4
 Suryanarkoil 206

- svarganiti* 280
 Swaminatha Aiyar, Dr 20, 28, 44-5, 54, 65, 72, 100,
 201, 275, 302, 325-6, 329
 Talaikkol 28
 Tagadur Yathirai 380
 Tagore 325
 Talai malai kanda deva 285 talattu 155
 talipot palm 305
talasai 204
 Tamil alphabet 11
 Tamil isai movement 44, 325
 — language 10
 — lexicon 38, 278
 — literature 12
 — nad 3, 40
 — nad, the land 3
 — neri vilakkam 26, 28
 — prose 294-302
 — sangham 16
 — script 304-11
Tamil seyyul kalambakam 257
 — vidu dutu 248
tandakam 131-2 [308
 Tandavaraya mudaliar 300,
 Tandavaraya swami 20
 Tanigai-puranam 285
Tanippadal tirattu 257
Tani seyyul cintamani 257
 Tanjavur 49, 266, 315
 Tattuvaprakasa 205
 Tattuvarayar 219, 248, 258
 Tayumanavar 188, 190-1, 193, 209, 233, 271, 282
Tayumanavar padal 257 technical terms 11
 Telugu 10, 43-4, 307, 313
 Telugu script in manipravala Tembavani 277 [297-8
 temple pipers and dancers 48
 Ten idylls 66
 Tenkalai 285
 Tenkasi 284
 Tenkasi Pandiyas 284, 317-8
 Teraiyar 274
 Thailand 291
 thesaurus 66
Tilakar puranam 286, 293
 Tillai 246
 Tillai tiruchitrakutam 153
tinar 31-2, 58-9, 94, 332
Tinar malai 150 92, 94
Tinar mol 50 92, 94
 Tingalur 132
Tiri kadukam 92, 176 [235
 Tiri kutarajappa kavirayar
 Tiri siramalai antadi 318, 320
 Tiru adhigai 319
 Tiru alundur 123-4
 — alankadu 112
 — amur 186
 — angamalai 131, 161
 — annamalai 319, 321
 — Arangattamudanar 149
 — aiur 135, 319
 — arur mumman kovai
 — arutpa [320
 — arutpayan 205, 278
 — asiriyam 163
 — avaduturai 206
 — chanda viruttam 151, 158
 Tiru chendur 42
 — Chendur Murugan pillai
Tamil 243
 — cirappalli 232
 — elukutirukkai 160
 — empavai 252
 — isaiippa 142-3, 193
 — kalambakam 228
 — kalar 141
 — kalitruppadiyar 204
 — kalukkunram 137
 — kovaiyar 139, 199, 224, [246
 — kovalur 149, 321
 — Kural 73, 92-3, 114, 194, 302
 — Kural uraikkottu 200
 — Kuruhappiran 213,
 — kuruhur 162 [297, 303
 — Kuruntandakam 160
 — Kuruntohai 132
 — madal 247

Tiru mal 39, 64, 184
 — malai 151
 — malai nayak 42, 216
 — malisai alvar 151
 — mangai alvar 132, 148, 150, 158-62, 166, 247, 258, 256
 — mantiram 143-4, 147, 185
 — mular 143-4, 147, 158, 185-6, 202, 261, 274
 — murai 126, 200
 — murai kanda puranam 45
 — murugarruppadai 66, 145, 184, 239
 — nagari 162
 — naraiyur 161
 — navalur 186
 — navukkarasu 138
 — neduntandakam 160
 — nelvayil aratturai 319
 — nelveli 42, 268, 270-1, — nelveli puranam 284 [271-7
 — nerisai 132, 160
 — nilakantha yalppana
 — nurrantadi 228 [41, 128
 — orriyur 135
 — padirippuliyur 49
 — pallandu 253
 — palli eluchi 151
 — panalvar 150-2, 158, 166, 286
 — pati 3 [291
 — pavai 156, 214, 251,
 — perumturai 137, 253
 — porur 228
 — porur sannidhi murai 188
 — puhal 24, 41, 189-90,
 — puhal mani 193 [281
 — puhal on Visnu 216
 — puli 162
 — takka deva 108, 110-1 255, 284
 — tandakam 132, 160
 — tondattohai 135
 — undiyyar 204

Tiru vacakam 49, 136-9, 141, 143, 190, 204, 224, 269, 278, 281
 — vadavur 137
 — vadavurar puranam 235
 — vahuppu 189
 — vaiyaru 48
 — vali nadu 159 [287
 — valluvamalai 74, 82
 — valluvar 73, 75, 115, 173-4, 181, 198, 328
 — vaymoli 148, 163-4, 213, 297
 — vehha 68
 — vellarai temple 321
 — venkatam 3, 150, 153, [160
 — venkatanathar 104, 220
 — vidaivay 318, 321
 — vilayadal puranam 52, 72, 208, 235, 300
 — viruttam 163
 — V Kalyanasundara mudaliar 192, 325
 T K C 260, 325-6
 T K S brothers 54
 Tolamoli deva 111
Tolkappiyam 9-11, 15-7, 19, 26-36, 39, 46, 54, 75, 194, 196-7, 199-201, 227-8, 288, 269, 296, 302, 320, 333
Tolkappiyar 10, 17, 21, 25-6, 29-33, 57, 308, 314
Tolkappiya urai 196-7
 Tolstoy 81
 Tondai nad 5
 Tondar adippodi alvar 151-2
 Tondi 5, 60
Tonnul vilakkam 27, 277
 Tools of writing 305 toxicology 273-4
 Tragedy 86, 267
 Translation of poems
 Avvai 292, Kambar 119-121, Karaikkal Ammai 145-291, Kural 79, Nammal, var 164, Paripadal 64,

- 185, Purananūru 68, 285, Sambandar 180, Tirumalīśai alvai 151, Tirumular
144, Tondaradippodī alvai Truth is God 148 [152
tumbai 388
Tyagaraja swami 48-4 typewriting 304
Udayanan katha 18
Udayanakumara kavyam 226
Ugrap-peruvaludī 59
ula 145, 238, 244, 246-7, 251
Ulaganiti 280
ulīnai 388
Ullamudaiyan 274
Umapatī sīvam 136, 147
285, 285 248, 257, 278
Umarupulavai 280
undi 254, 269
United States
Upadesakandam 236
upagama 237
upanishad 177, 217
Uppurī kudī kilān 59
uraiyūr 152
urdu words 282
urī iyal 36
usal 254
uttara kandam 51
Uttara kosamangai 137-8
uvamai 34
Vaccanandi malai 27-8, 225
vadakalai 166, 215
Vadaku tiruvīdhi pillai 297
Vada malai venba 45
Vadamalayappa pillai 42
Vadapalanī temple 198
Vadavur 137
Vadikesari alagiya manavala jiyar 218
Vadivalakiyanambēdasar 286
Vahai 32, 382
Vaidyanatha desika 27, 104
Vaigai river 6, 64
Vaishnava 11-2, 14, 77
Vaishnava acaryas 23, 297
Vaishnava canon 14, 40, 60, 117 148-58, 202, 291, 297
Vaishnava literature 200
Vaishnava vyakhyana writers 296
Vaishnavism, north and south
215 Vaiyapurī pillai 20, 38,
73-5, 85, 188 326, 329
Vajranandi 19-20
vakki 288
Valayapati
vallarppattu 269 vallai 68
valluva community 74
Valmiki 16 19, 101, 117
Valmiki Ramayana 19 [168
Vamana muni 233
vanappu 32
Vanji 4, 67, 91, 289, 338
Vanjikandam 87, 91
vanjippa 12
vannakkalanjiyam 259, 281
vannam 258-9, 281
Varaguna pandiya 192
Varatungaramapandiya 225, varippattu 22, 269 [298
varukkakkovai 255
Vasuki 75
vati 288
vatteluttu 12, 306-7, 311
Vayusamhita 232
Vedanayakam pillai 44, 180, vedanta 14 [278
Vedanta Cudamani 221, 224
Vedanta desika 149, 166,
187, 214-5
Vedanta manana cintamani 258
Vedanta writing 217-21
Vedas 163
Velalar 299
Velvikkudi grant 91, 317
Venadu 308
veuba 12-3, 27, 75-6, 92-3, 95, 108, 174-5, 178-9
Vengai temple 223
Venkatam 3

- Venkatarajulu reddyar 303
 Venkatasami, Sini 321
 Venkatesa 161
 Vennainallur 123
 Venni 67
 Venrimalai Kavirayar 45
ventalai 76
Verriverkar 177, 179
 verse types 97
setci 32, 332 veterinary science 273
vidu 173, 181
 Vijayalaya chola 315
 Vijayanagar 215, 308-9, 319
 Vikrama chola
 Vilancholai pillai 285
vilasam 58
Villi bharatam 72, 108
villuppattu 268
 Villi putturar 103, 170, 287
 Vinayaka 209
Vinayakar ahaval 188, 263
 Vinnagar 150
Vinodarasa manjari 300, 303
 virali 249-50
Viralai arruppada 240, 249
Viralai vidu dutu 249
 viraliyar 48
 Virama munivar 276
 Viramarthanda deva 255
 Vira rajendra chola 315, 320
 Vira saiva hagiology 223
 Vira saiva literature 104, 221-4
 Virasami chettiyar 300, 303
Virasoliyam 27, 34, 230, 296, 302
viruttam 13-4, 27, 37, 105-6, 108, 112, 146, 179-80, 259
 Vishnu 9, 39, 68, 116
 Vishnu chittan 154
Vishnu purana 232
 Visishtadvaita 217
vittarakavi 283
 Vittuvakkodu 153
Viveka cintamani 180
Vow of Draupati 170
 vulgarity 327-8
 V. V. S. Aiyar 325
 Vyasa 168, 170, 203
 Water divining 274
 War activities 31-2 war poetry 207 widows 268
 Winslow 278
 women 7, 79, 262
 — dancers 315
 women poets 289-93
 women's status 7
 World war II writing direction 305 writing variation 304 writing work 294
 Yaga Yajurveda 163
 yal 41, 67, 84, 128, 150
yamakam
yapparunkalak-karikai 26-7, [197 225 yapparunkalam 28, 225, 228, [230, 302 yapparum kala virutti 197, 275, [296, 303
yappu Yasodai 153-5
Yasodara kavyam 112-3, 226
 Yavanar 62
 yoga 206, 273

ERRATA

Page	Line	Error	Correction
41	27	compositions	compositions. ⁶
67	4	langugage	language
80	28	chaptors	chapters
84	32	his the queen	his queen
102	1	is a	is an
107	26	extraovdınarily	extraordinarily
110	17	predominent	predominant
124	1	miles for	miles from
148	20	Tiruvoymol.	Tiruvaymol.
149	19	Tiruvallikkem	Tirumayilai
	30	the	they
155	page heading	Saiva	Vaisnava
159	1	Vaishna	Vaisnava
	28	astakasra	astaksara
176	28	verses	lines
208	6-7	over 9000	6892
218	30	Vadkesari	Vadikesari
244	14	} dhutu	dutu
248	9, 10, 18, 22, 32, 38
249	6, 21
281	25	20th	19th
292	26	is yet	are yet
304	3	advanccs	advances
311	31	any	any ado
332	2	peotry	poetry
342	15	Kalavlyal urai written down	Remove this line and place it as line 2 against the entry 900- 1000.